Senate votes for witnesses

GOP blocks dismissal of case; Lewinsky to testify

WASHINGTON — The Republican-controlled Senate blocked dismissal of the impeachment case against President Clinton on Wednesday and then voted for new testimony from Monica Lewinsky and two other witnesses — but by margins well short of the two-thirds that would be needed to oust the president.

In a pair of roll calls in the hushed Senate chamber, all 55 Republicans voted against dismissal and for the witnesses opposed by the White House. They were joined by a single Democrat, Russell Feingold of Wisconsin, leaving them far below the 67 needed for conviction.

"The president will not be removed from office," Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle declared moments later in comments swiftly seconded by the White House. "For the good of the country and in keeping with the Constitution it is now time to end this trial."

Even before the votes, Daschle and Majority Leader Trent Lott were at work trying to fashion a bipartisan agreement for the balance of the trial, including videotaped depositions of Ms. Lewinsky, presidential friend Vernon Jordan and White House aide Sidney Blumenthal.

By late afternoon, Lott told reporters the two parties had exchanged offers and he said he was hopeful for agreement by Thursday on a timetable for a final vote on the articles of impeachment by mid-February. He suggested the witness depositions — possibly videotaped — could take place over the weekend or Monday, and left open the question of whether the White House might then decide it wanted witnesses of its own.

Daschle, too, said he was hopeful of an agreement within 24 hours.

Pope argues against death penalty

Visit may have postponed execution in heartland

The Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — Pope John Paul II condemned capital punishment in some of his strongest terms yet Wednesday, urging 100,000 worshippers at a Mass in this death-penalty state to spare even those who commit "great evil."

"Modern society has the means of protecting itself without definitively denying criminals the chance to reform," he said at the Trans World Dome on the final day of his visit to the Americas.

"I renew the appeal I made most recently at Christmas for a consensus to end the death penalty, which is both cruel and unnecessary."

The message may have had particular relevance in Missouri, where the state Supreme Court, without explanation, postponed an execution that was to have taken place while the pope was in town. Papal spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls called the delay "a mockery." On Jan. 13, a killer was executed by injection in Missouri.

Addressing the largest crowd of his 30-hour visit to the United States, his fifth to the U.S. mainland, the pope also lashed out against abortion, euthanasia and assisted suicide, and declared that "the dignity of human life must never be taken away," even in the case of someone who has done great evil."

He also invited Roman Catholics separated from their faith to return to the church, even if there are "obstacles to Eucharistic participation," a reference to divorce and remarriage.

And he called on his flock to end racism. Racism is "a plague which your bishops have called one of the most persistent and destructive evils of the nation," the stooped, 78-year-old pontiff said, his voice hoarse and words slurred.

Later in the day, he led a prayer service at the Cathedral Basilica and was to meet with civil rights pioneer Rosa Parks, the black seamstress whose refusal to give up her seat on a segregated bus in 1955 led to the Montgomery, Ala., bus boycott.

John Paul was also scheduled to meet with Vice President Al Gore before leaving for Rome Wednesday night.

During the evening prayer service, the pope welcomed Muslims and Jews who joined him in the Romanesque cathedral that houses the world's largest collection of mosaics. For the first time, a rabbi, Robert P. Jacobs, participated in a Roman Catholic papal prayer service.

"May this prayer signify our shared commitment to ever greater understanding and cooperation," the pope told the audience of 2,000.

He preached to his flock about the duty that comes with power.

– Pope John Paul II

"Radical changes in world politics leave America with a heightened responsibility to be for the world an example of genuinely free, democratic, just and humane society," he said.

Power "is service, not privilege. Its exercise is morally justifiable when it is used for the good of all, when it is sensitive to the needs of the poor and defenseless."

More than 100,000 people filled the seats of the Trans World Dome and an adjoining convention center, where the pope's image was projected on giant TV screens with running captions of his homily. One thousand priests celebrated Mass with the pope.

The faithful came for blessings, cures or just a glimpse of the man credited with hastening the fall of Communism and lessening religious restrictions in Cuba.

Ida Costa, a cancer-stricken 77-year-old woman from Little Rock, Ark., looked for a miracle cure from the pope: "I'll get the blessings God wants to shower upon me in his presence."

The pope's condemnation of the death penalty brought mixed reactions from those at the Mass.

"I don't know. I guess we've all got a right to live, but I don't know, especially when they take someone else's life. I don't think they do have, then," said William Walker of Alton, Ill.

"As a Catholic, it's easy to be against abortion," said Douglas Marshall of St. Louis. But as for sparing the life of an evil person, "that's the thing. It all boils down to a matter of forgiveness. Are you willing to forgive an evil person?"

Cops nab robbery suspect

The Times-News

TWIN FALLS – The suspect in Tuesday's robbery of US Bank was arrested Wednesday morning at the Twin Falls airport, police said.

The 19-year-old woman, who has not been charged with bank robbery, was found around 6 a.m. at the airport by FBI agents and Twin Falls police, said a news release by police Sgt. Don Hall.

Someone entered the bank at 748 Blue Lakes Blvd. N. Wednesday afternoon and left with an undisclosed amount of money, police said. The suspect was described as a black female, 5 feet 4 inches tall and about 140 pounds.

The woman arrested was arraigned Wednesday on charges of possession of marijuana and paraphernalia in Twin Falls County court. Any charges stemming from the bank robbery would be filed in U.S. District Court in Boise.

Wednesday's robbery was the second Twin Falls bank robbery in less than a year. In May a man with a gun robbed the Bank of America branch at 1040 Shoshone St. N. That case remains unsolved.

The same US Bank building that was robbed Wednesday was robbed in June 1996 when it was a West One Bank. That robber used a fake bomb as his weapon, and the FBI believes he has committed at least 11 bank robberies across the Northwest and Utah.

State seeks protection from Y2K legal fallout

"It is possible all the errors may not be remedied," said Jo Ann Guilfoy, a state deputy attorney general.

BSU study derails ideas about Idaho sex crimes

By Gregory Hahn
Times-News writer

BOISE – The head of a Boise State University study of sexual abuse in the state broke a few myths in a Senate committee meeting Wednesday.

Just 1 percent of all adults and no juveniles sentenced for child sexual assault in the state last year were strangers to the abused children, said Bob Marsh, a professor in BSU's criminal justice department.

Around 90 percent of those arrested on these crimes had no prior offenses, he said.

And Idaho's high sexual abuse their functions or shut down. All agencies are reviewing this chance, and the state is overseeing the process, but the Legislature needs to be aware the state be sued if anything slips by, said Pam Ahrens, the department's director.

The bill would exempt government agencies from being liable in tort or contract claims.

But Sen. James Risch, R-Boise, said the bill is an abuse of power by the state.

"Why should we make ourselves immune just because we can?" he asked during a Senate Judiciary and Rules Committee discussion of the proposal.

Risch was the lone senator voting against the idea, which was printed and introduced Wednesday. It could come back to the committee for another hearing later.

The bill would protect the state, even if it were "guilty as sin" in causing damages, Risch said. If the state truly has prepared as best it can, it should be protected from lawsuits anyway.

"Let the system work," he said. "We just don't need this."

Guilfoy argued the Y2K problem is unique, though, and the state needs to be ready for anything. Besides, she added, the state has this power.

Ahrens said the department wants the bill to raise the Legislature's awareness of the issue. Other states are taking similar measures, she said, and Idaho lawmakers need to be concerned.

"If it's printed," she said, "there's an opportunity for debate."

rate may not indicate the problem is worse here than elsewhere; Idaho's aggressive attention to the problem may increase the rate of reporting.

The attorney general reports on the issue every year. For seven years, BSU has helped complete the research. Marsh told the Senate Judiciary and Rules Committee that the Legislature should take three cues from this year's study: Improve the treatment available, focus on preventing the problem before it happens, and encourage courts to make a sexual evaluation of the offender available to judges before sentencing.

Sen. Mel Richardson, R-Idaho Falls, asked about the effectiveness of sexual offender rehabilitation, which often is said to be unlikely if not impossible.

But Marsh said the university has looked at programs around the country and developed a regimented model program that can work.

"It is possible," he said. "It's more costly, and it's more time-consuming. It's more involved."

Just 1 percent of all adults and no juveniles sentenced for child sexual assault in the state last year were strangers to the abused children. ... Around 90 percent of those arrested on these crimes had no prior offenses.

The best way to prevent sexual abuse, Marsh said, is to educate parents about where threats lie. In almost all cases of child sexual abuse, perpetrators are family members or close friends – people with legitimate access to the children. The sophisticated predator depicted in books such as Vladimir Nabokov's "Lolita" are in the minority.

The third issue, providing judges with better information before sentencing, addresses the timing of the process. Sen. Betsy Dunklin, D-Boise, asked whether a rise in probation sentences meant more dangerous sexual predators are on the street. Marsh said no, because most of the offenders don't fit that category. But he said a report on the offender's sexual history, which eventually is prepared for every defendant, should be available to judges so they know more during sentencing.

"Without it," Marsh said, "I think you're really operating in the dark."

Marsh also voiced support for an idea that never has made it far in the Statehouse. Sen. Cecil Ingram, R-Boise, said some lawmakers want to make it easier for offenders to turn themselves in, so they know they'll get help and not get thrown in jail and on the sex-offender list.

Anything that prevents more victims is worth looking at, Marsh said.

"We don't have to intervene with our criminal justice system to solve all of our social problems," he said.

Idaho senators vote to depose witnesses in impeachment trial

By Robin Brown
States News Service

Larry Craig

Mike Crapo

WASHINGTON – Sens. Larry Craig and Mike Crapo voted with fellow Republicans Thursday to continue with the impeachment trial of President Clinton and to depose three witnesses.

The Senate voted 56 to 44 on both motions – one to dismiss the charges and one to depose former White House intern Monica Lewinsky, Clinton friend Vernon Jordan and White House aide Sidney Blumenthal.

"There are very real discrepancies out there," said Craig about why he voted for witnesses. "Not all of the dots have been connected. The depositions by those three people will connect those dots."

"There are questions that Monica Lewinsky will be asked that have not been asked before," said Craig, a member of Senate Republican leadership, although he declined to elaborate.

"If three months from now, in a book written by Monica Lewinsky, or in an interview with Barbara Walters," Craig said, "she confesses her soul and it dramatically differs from what she said before, the American public would say, 'Why weren't you thorough?'"

Crapo stressed that despite the mostly party-line votes, senators still were striving for bipartisanship.

"I am really pleased that even though we had to get past this point, members on both sides of the aisle are still handling this in a bipartisan fashion," Crapo said. "Both sides want to be sure not to let this become personal or partisan."

Craig said he was pleased with the way the trial is unfolding.

"We see as our standard a fair, impartial truth-seeking process, and we've worked mightily to hold it in a bipartisan mode, and we've met that test," Craig said.

Crapo said he voted against the motion to dismiss because he thought it was premature to end the trial without hearing from witnesses.

"I think it sets a dangerous constitutional precedent to hold the proceedings and then to terminate the procedure before the conclusion of the case," Crapo said.

Both Idahoans predicted the trial would be over within a week or two weeks.

Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., and Sen. Slade Gorton, R-Wash., meet reporters Wednesday on Capitol Hill. Lott earlier in the day told the U.S. Chamber of Commerce Congress will take on a number of issues following President Clinton's impeachment trial, including education, military pay and the year 2000 computer problem.

For some Americans, Senate vote means no relief from Clinton saga

The Associated Press

For many Americans, the Senate's two votes Wednesday added up to one exasperating reality: The impeachment saga isn't over.

"Everybody already knows what's already been said. I feel they're just wasting taxpayer dollars," said Tracie Dawson, 26, an assistant video store manager in Oakland, Md. "I think they should just drop the whole thing and I'm a Republican."

When asked about the votes — not to dismiss the case against Clinton and to call three witnesses — many people focused more on how an opportunity to end the 13-month-old ordeal had slipped away than on the intricate legalities of the two motions.

"I am disgusted. If I had my way, both the House and the Senate would be impeached," said Theresa Gilmore, 30, of Columbus, Ohio. "What else are they going to get?"

Some took comfort in the motions, saying the trial shouldn't be limited or cut short simply to satisfy a restless public.

"I think what I've taken away from this is that it's reinforced my faith in the American political system," said Helena Wolin, a 19-year-old sophomore at the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia. "It shows that the government is strong enough to check a president who has abused his powers."

The Senate voted 56-44 along nearly unanimous party lines Wednesday to summon Monica Lewinsky and two other witnesses. The same senators voted not to dismiss the charges.

Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., voted with Republicans on both measures. Some people in his home state were impressed by his independence.

"He obviously made his decision so he could get more information before he can vote on impeachment," said Dennis Dums, a member of a private security watchdog group from Madison, Wis. "I've trusted his past decisions and I trust this one."

Others were angry that he had broken ranks. "I am surprised why he voted against his own party," said Raymond Kowalski, 60, of Mosinee, Wis. "I don't understand what he is going to gain by it."

Some focused on the question that prompted Democratic Sen. Robert Byrd of West Virginia to submit the failed motion to dismiss the charges: What's the point of continuing when it's already clear Republicans don't have the two-thirds majority needed to convict Clinton?

"They're not going to have enough votes in the end, and they already know that, so it is kind of a waste of taxpayer time and money," said Jeff Sherrer, 31, as he shopped at a book store in his hometown of Minneapolis.

Sir Robert Bell, 60, a British knight who has lived in the United States for 20 years, said it's the Democrats who "are making a fool of themselves."

He said he was pleased the charges weren't dismissed. "At least the Republicans are putting the Constitution to the test."

What's next?

Here is what's ahead as the Senate continues to consider the case for removing William Jefferson Clinton from the presidency:

- ☐ Today, Senate leaders are likely to announce the schedule for the remainder of the trial, then will recess the court of impeachment until Tuesday.
- ☐ Friday-Monday — House prosecutors and White House lawyers would depose the three witnesses — Monica Lewinsky, Clinton confidant Vernon Jordan and White House adviser Sidney Blumenthal.
- ☐ Tuesday — The Senate reconvenes as a court of impeachment and votes on whether to hear from any of the witnesses live in the well of the Senate.
- ☐ Wednesday — The Senate either hears live testimony from witnesses or proceeds to hear closing arguments from both sides. At this point, the Senate also could entertain a motion from White House lawyers to examine evidence or present their own witnesses.

Test vote may prove Democratic strength to save Clinton's job

By Terrence Hunt

Analysis

WASHINGTON — The Senate clerk intoned the vote: 56 to 44, the Democrats lost. But in losing, they seemed to prove they have the strength to save Bill Clinton's presidency. "Game free," one historian said.

The Republicans won Wednesday's battle of two-test votes. There was only one Democratic defector, Wisconsin's Russ Feingold.

But even in defeat, the Democrats seemed to win the war. They demonstrated they do not believe the evidence warrants Clinton's removal and do not intend to help Republicans achieve the 67 votes required to send the president packing.

The real suspense now — absent any bombshells — is how both sides can find a quick way out. "It seems to me Clinton is home free," said Columbia University historian Henry Graff. "I gather there is a movement to say some many things and then vote him not guilty. There may be something like a sense of the Senate resolution which says, 'We don't like what you've done.'"

Republicans know that Americans are sick of the year-long soap opera and want to move on to other matters. But the GOP also recognizes that its conservative base wants Clinton chased out of town or at least humiliated as much as possible.

The challenge for Republicans is to try to satisfy the base without incurring the wrath of the public. Some analysts think that is an impossible task.

"The Republicans seem to be following a strategy of getting out as fast as they can but doing it in a respectable way," said Vanderbilt University political scientist Erwin Hargrove.

If the process drags on, "It can ring the death knell of Republican control in the Senate," said presidential historian and biographer Robert Dallek of Boston University.

To hasten the end, Republican prosecutors shaved their witness list to just three people — a "pitiful three," in the words of lead prosecutor Henry Hyde, R-Ill. — although the GOP had hoped once to call as many as 15.

They also promised not to ask Monica Lewinsky — either in depositions or in live testimony in the Senate — about "her explicit sexual relations with the president." Republicans recognize they can't win unless they can shake up the case somehow and change a lot of minds.

Putting the best interpretation on the vote, GOP prosecutor Asa Hutchinson of Arkansas said, "It most likely indicates that at the present time there are not the two-thirds votes necessary. But I think it shows that on both sides they're looking at the facts ...."

But Democrats saw the vote as the handwriting on the wall. "The president will not be removed from office," Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle declared. "It is time to move on."

The public's view of the case was summed up by Jeff Sharratt, 31, as he browsed a book shop in Minneapolis. "I think people are tired of the whole impeachment trial and I think it should be done away with. They're not going to have the votes in the end, and they already know that, so it is kind of a waste of taxpayer time and money."

SURPLUS AND SECURITY

Political debate begins over Clinton's plan

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Clinton summoned approving academics and economists to the White House on Wednesday to endorse his Social Security rescue plan, push for Medicare reforms and argue against tax cuts.

In order to shore up Social Security and Medicare for retiring baby boomers, Clinton said, "We will simply have to have a bipartisan process."

But Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott made clear from Capitol Hill that Republicans, who want a 10 percent income tax cut, will not just hand over the budget surplus to Clinton, no matter how much assent he collected in the East Room of the White House.

"Take 62 percent (of the surplus) for Social Security, and the rest should go back to the taxpayers in tax cuts," Lott, R-Miss., told reporters. "The president hasn't gone far enough, but he tiptoed out in the water."

"It is well to remember that the current prosperity of this country was created not by rash actions in Washington," countered Clinton.

The president's top economic adviser also responded to critics such as Bill Archer, R-Texas, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. Archer said Clinton's proposal to invest Social Security funds in the stock market for potentially higher returns would mean "relying on government investment decisions that are subject to political pressures."

Gene Sperling, chairman of Clinton's National Economic Council, told questioning lawmakers assembled in the East Room that the investments would be made by private-sector managers "independent and insulated" from one another and selected through competitive bidding.

The White House estimates the federal surplus at $4.4 trillion over the next 15 years. Clinton has proposed using the biggest chunk, 62 percent, to bolster Social Security and dedicating another 15 percent to increase the solvency of — and add a prescription-drug benefit to — Medicare, the health-care program for the elderly and disabled.

Princeton University economist Uwe Reinhart, a familiar voice of support for Clinton on health issues, called the plan civilized and said it would be a sin not to adopt it.

"As I understand the response, those who disagree with us are uncivilized sinners," joked Vice President Al Gore.

A new poll by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press showed half of Americans favor applying the surplus to Social Security over using it for a tax cut, retiring the national debt or domestic spending. And more than half, 52 percent, opposed investing Social Security money in the stock market.

Clinton seized Wednesday's occasion to dispute suggestions that, by pouring billions from the surplus into Medicare, unpopular cost-containments could be avoided. "I did not intend to say that 'Whoop-dee-doo! Now we don't have to make any changes in the program,'" he said.

Clinton released letters from government accountants backing his claim that under his plan, Social Security would gain more than 20 years of financial health — through 2055 — and Medicare would be able to pay its bills until 2020, instead of 2008.

Gen Xers don't bank on checks

Indifference could cost them in the end

Knight Ridder News Service

Young people are notoriously doubtful that they will get a cent of their Social Security benefits. Many think they'll see a UFO before they see a Social Security check, or that a pro wrestler will become president before they collect all of their benefits.

So it's not surprising that at a time when President Clinton, the Congress and much of the nation are furiously debating how to reform Social Security, young people are largely absent from that discussion.

They don't vote, they don't pressure their lawmakers, they don't learn about different alternatives — many don't even seem to care what happens.

"I'm sure they'll find a way to phase it out by the time I'm ready to retire in 2050," said Amanda Green, 19, a sophomore at Bates College in Lewiston, Maine. "And if I do get any money, it won't be nearly what I worked so hard for and what they took out of my paycheck my whole life."

The problem is that young people are likely to be the ones most affected by the Social Security debate, and their indifference could cost them more than they think.

Influential older voters will make younger workers "pay through the nose," predicts Richard Thau, of Third Millennium, a "Generation X" advocacy group.

Changing the system could make a dramatic difference in the futures of Americans now under 30. Smarter investing of Social Security taxes could significantly reduce their taxes and increase the amounts available later for their benefits.

Some proposed reforms — permitting private investment of a share of the Social Security tax money — also would play to the computer skills and communications savvy of young people. The tradeoff is they involve much more risk and uncertainty.

Financial experts believe young people would be willing to accept those odds.

"Even with the risks, I think they would still feel better off having control over their money than relying on big government," said Susan A. MacManus, a professor at University of South Florida, in Tampa, and an expert on generational conflicts.

Indeed, a recent survey found that 84 percent of 18- to 34-year-olds favor giving workers a choice of where to invest their Social Security taxes. The study, released this month by mutual fund company Oppenheimer Funds Inc., polled 804 adults and had a margin of error of plus or minus 3.5 percent.

But many young people remain very skeptical about the chances of bringing real change to the system.

"All I know is that Social Security is in a crisis, which means it is not working well, so I have no hopes about getting any of it," said Francisco Acosta, a 24-year-old bus boy for a pizzeria in Arlington, Va.

There are good reasons for the pessimism.

Right now, there are three workers paying taxes to support each beneficiary. By about 2030 — after 71 million baby boomers retire — only two workers will be supporting each beneficiary.

By then, Social Security taxes are expected to cover only about 72 percent of benefits. And because senior citizens write and call their lawmakers and vote, they are likely to have the political power to demand 100 percent of their benefits — at great cost to younger workers, who would have to shoulder that with higher taxes.

At the same time, young people are right in expecting to receive less from Social Security than previous generations, because working people now pay higher taxes into the system and many are expected to work more years — retiring at 67, not 65.

"What they see, correctly, is that the rate of return that they will achieve on their payments of taxes and their employers' taxes is very low, especially compared to what you could now get even in a U.S. Treasury Bond," Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan testified before Congress this month.

"The best that younger people can hope for is that the baby boomers don't destroy the Social Security system," said youth advocate Thau.

New drug helps some arthritis cases

The Associated Press

The standard medicine for rheumatoid arthritis appears to ease pain and swelling significantly better when combined with a newly approved, genetically engineered drug.

For the last decade, methotrexate has been the first-choice drug because it relieves symptoms quickly and more effectively than other drugs.

Still, it doesn't help many patients enough, so researchers compared using methotrexate alone and using it with an injectable drug called Enbrel, the first genetically engineered medication sold for arthritis.

In a 1997 study of 89 patients, reported in today's New England Journal of Medicine, Weinblatt and colleagues at other hospitals found pain and swelling decreased noticeably in 71 percent of patients who got both drugs for six weeks. The rate was 27 percent for patients who got methotrexate and a dummy shot.

Symptoms decreased as much as 70 percent for 15 percent of the patients who got Enbrel and methotrexate, compared with none who only took methotrexate.

Rheumatoid arthritis is an autoimmune disease in which rogue immune cells attack the tissue cushioning joints, eventually disabling many patients.

Top regulator advises caution for online trades

WASHINGTON (AP) — As the Internet transforms investing, people should exercise the same caution trading electronically as when going through a broker, the government's top securities regulator cautioned Wednesday.

The remarks by Arthur Levitt, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, came amid regulators' concern over the recent wild swings of the Nasdaq Stock Market. The concern led the brokers' group operating the Nasdaq market to warn investors Tuesday they may lose money from delays in executing trades when the market is volatile and overburdened from heavy trading volume.

"Investing in the stock market will always entail risk, no matter how you do it," Levitt said in an interview with The Associated Press. "It is just as easy, if not more so, to lose money through the click of a button as it is to make it."

Hand transplant patient is fine

LOUISVILLE, Ky. (AP) — The man given the country's first transplanted hand is showing no sign of rejecting it, his doctor said Wednesday.

Doctors have found no blood clots or reduced blood flow in Matthew Scott's donor hand and no indication of immune system rejection, said Dr. Warren Breidenbach, the lead transplant surgeon.

"Everything looks excellent with Matt," Breidenbach said at a news conference.

Scott, 37, of Absecon, N.J., underwent 14 1/2 hours of surgery Sunday and Monday at Jewish Hospital. He lost his left hand in 1985 in an explosion of an M-80, a powerful and illegal firecracker.

Heroin turns model student into robber

Teen-ager awaits trial as an adult

BERKLEY, Mich. (AP) — A high school honor student and gymnast in this Detroit suburb has been charged with armed robbery and is a suspect in several others, allegedly to support a heroin habit.

Sarah Plumb

Sarah Plumb, 16, is in a juvenile lockup, awaiting trial as an adult on charges that could land her a life prison sentence.

In all of the stickups, the robber said she had a weapon but did not show it, police said. Michigan law requires only the threat of a weapon for an armed-robbery conviction.

Defense attorney Howard Arnkoff said Ms. Plumb should have been handled as a juvenile and should have been charged with something less than armed robbery, since no weapon was displayed.

"If she gets convicted, its a non-probational offense. She must be incarcerated. She must be sent to prison. And I seriously doubt she could get the help she needs," he said.

Sarah Plumb, 16, of Berkley, Mich., an honor student and varsity gymnast, is charged with robbing this gas station next to the high school to support her $200-a-day heroin habit. The station is within walking distance of the school gymnasium.

Police said she had a $200-a-day heroin habit — a figure one expert said was significant.

"That's a pretty chronic stage of their addiction. Generally, clients buy in $10 increments," said Bruce Goldberg, a therapist at Botsford General Hospital's Eastwood Clinic who said Ms. Plumb likely was sharing the drug with other people.

Unlikely suspects charged in California robberies

SANTA CRUZ, Calif. (AP) — She wore a Spice Girls T-shirt, her blonde hair cut in a conservative bob. His striped sweater was clean and neat. Detectives figured the pair who allegedly pulled off two armed robberies weren't run-of-the-mill criminals.

But even they were surprised to learn the suspects were students at the University of California, Santa Cruz, and their alleged getaway driver an elementary school teaching aide.

Emma Rose Freeman, 18, a National Merit Scholar, is accused of pointing a .380-caliber Beretta semiautomatic handgun at a terrified stylist while robbing a hair salon on Jan. 16 with her boyfriend Anthony Louis Christophani, a senior philosophy major.

Five days later when a security guard at a Costco warehouse store asked to see receipts for a boom box and Walkman-like stereo system, she allegedly turned to him with the gun and said: "Back off. Don't do anything stupid."

On Wednesday, it was Miss Freeman who shook with fear as a judge warned that she could spend 25 years to life in prison if convicted of the two armed robberies.

Christophani and Craig Dickson, 23-year-old roommates, posted bail earlier on the same charges. But Judge Heather Morse raised Miss Freeman's bail from $25,000 to $150,000 as prosecutors filed additional charges of brandishing the weapon.

Santa Cruz police Sgt. Steve Clark said Miss Freeman had told detectives that she needed money so "she could concentrate on her art."

But as she clutched tissues in her shaking hands, Miss Freeman told the judge Wednesday she had taken out student loans to pay her college tuition.

Family found dead in running car

Father was under investigation by CPS

FORT WORTH, Texas (AP) — A man accused of abusing his two sons apparently got his wife to be a willing participant in a murder-suicide scheme that left them and the two boys dead, police said Wednesday.

Armando Nunez, 33; his wife, Valree Nunez, 28; and sons Curtis, 7, and Robert, 4 — were found Tuesday morning in an old Chevy with a hose running from the exhaust pipe into the car. They and the family dog were dead from apparent carbon monoxide poisoning.

Investigators said there was no sign of trauma to Mrs. Nunez. The scene inside the car, parked behind their home, suggested the couple had enjoyed a final celebration together in the front seat as their children went to sleep for the last time in the back, officials said. Police found freshly used hamburger wrappers, a bottle of Wild Turkey whiskey and cigarettes in the front of the car.

"There was a bottle there and both Mom and Dad had individual glasses," police spokesman Lt. Mark Krey said. "There was a boom box."

Fort Worth police officers inspect a car in Fort Worth, Texas, Tuesday, where a family under investigation by Child Protective Services was found dead. Officers found the bodies of a father, mother, their 5- and 7-year-old sons and a German shepherd inside the running automobile.

There were pillows in the back seat for the children, who police believe were asleep before succumbing because of how they were found — side by side, flat on their backs.

"These sweet little boys ... it's hard to describe it, to tell you the truth," Officer Richard Carlberg said.

Neighbors said they didn't realize there was trouble in the family until Nunez's Jan. 11 arrest on an outstanding traffic warrant. That same day, state workers began investigating his sons' complaints that he had physically and sexually abused them.

Woman in health fraud case gets $29M

CHICAGO (AP) — A woman and her lawyer have been paid $29.1 million as a reward for blowing the whistle on health-care fraud at Blue Cross Blue Shield of Illinois.

"It's pretty overwhelming," said Evelyn Knoob of Carterville. "I'm relieved that it's finally settled."

Blue Cross Blue Shield of Illinois agreed last summer to pay $144 million to settle allegations that managers at its Marion office lied to auditors, destroyed documents and mishandled claims.

Mrs. Knoob, who worked for the company's Marion office, and attorney Ronald Osman of Marion, got more than the minimum whistle-blower payment, which would have been 15 percent of the civil penalty, or $21 million.

They have now received four government checks totaling $29,108,999.

Neither Osman, who got a contingency fee, nor Knoob would say how they split the reward. But Mrs. Knoob, 54, gave much of the credit to her lawyer.

Lung vaccine may stop ear infections

The Associated Press

A common microbe appears to be the leading virus causing painful middle ear infections in children.

Three types of bacteria are considered the most common causes of such infections, but viruses that cause respiratory infections are also known to be major culprits.

Dr. Terho Heikkinen and others from the University of Texas Medical Branch in Galveston studied 456 sufferers between the ages of 2 months and 7 years.

They found that respiratory viruses in the lungs of 186 of the children. The syncytial virus, or RSV, was most frequently implicated in ear infections, present in the middle ear fluid of 48 of the children.

Mayors look for new anti-gunmaker strategy

WASHINGTON (AP) — America's big city mayors are rethinking the idea of filing a joint, multicity lawsuit to force gun manufacturers to reimburse cities for law enforcement and medical costs resulting from shootings.

But they said Wednesday they are pursuing other options — including continued negotiations with the industry.

Meantime, Bridgeport, Conn., and the unified Miami-Dade County government in Florida on Wednesday joined the growing ranks of local governments announcing they will sue gun makers in an attempt to recover the costs of gun violence.

At the annual U.S. Conference of Mayors winter meeting, mayors said the complexities of dealing with a maze of jurisdictions and differing state laws made it unlikely they will join in a unified lawsuit. When states pressed their successful effort against the tobacco industry, each one wound up filing suit individually.

"I don't think you'll see any large-scale suits because you have 50 sets of state laws to deal with," Mayor Paul Helmke of Fort Wayne, Ind., told a news conference. "But we have to do something to deal with the violence."

Detroit Mayor Dennis Archer said several mayors joining in a class-action suit against the gun industry "would have a serious impact," but he agreed it probably wouldn't happen.

"Different cities have to examine their own circumstances," Archer said. "But the bottom line is every mayor wants to make their city safer."

More than 280 mayors gathered to discuss hot-button topics such as education, strengthening welfare-to-work programs and preparing for the 2000 census. But guns took center stage.

Government statistics show guns were used in 13,262 homicides and 18,232 suicides in 1996.

Last year, New Orleans and Chicago became the first two major cities to sue gun makers seeking to recover the cost of gun violence.

The Chicago suit, which seeks $433 million from the gun industry, accuses gunmakers of "flooding" the city with illegal guns, said Mayor Richard M. Daley.

Though crime rates are falling nationwide, Mayor Scott King of Gary, Ind., said guns are responsible for nearly 90 percent of the homicides in his city. Easy access to the weapons is the problem, he said.

Kidwell's only offense is being a good conservative

Remember that scene in "Casablanca" where the officer, proficient at roulette himself, feigns shock at the suggestion that there's gambling in Rick's Cafe Americain?

There was a similar expression of pseudo-shock roiling through the Capitol last week, with a planted leak that leaders of the religious right planned to attend Wayne Kidwell's swearing-in ceremony as the newest member of the Idaho Supreme Court.

We're supposed to be shocked that Kidwell has political allegiances? And why would that be, exactly?

Let's recap. Kidwell, a lifelong Republican, runs for the non-partisan spot on the state Supreme Court. He defeats Mike Wetherell, a lifelong Democrat, in what was, in name at least, a non-partisan election. Kidwell, a former Idaho attorney general and Reagan administration appointee, takes the helm.

If Wayne Kidwell is going to recuse himself on every issue involving an ally (i.e., a Republican), he'll be the Supreme Court's answer to the Maytag repairman.

If voters didn't know who Kidwell was before the election, they weren't paying attention. We knew Kidwell was a conservative Republican; we could have guessed he'd have more friends on the right than his opponent. So where's the shock?

Granted, this whole thing was clumsy politics. It probably wasn't wise for Kelly Walton, the point man in Idaho's anti-gay rights movement, to invite his followers to the ceremony with an e-mail sent "... on behalf of Wayne and Shari Kidwell." And it was even clumsier for Kidwell's wife to encourage the e-mailing, as Walton says happened.

But not every political blooper rises to the level of scandal.

Boise attorney John Hummel is overplaying things by asking the Idaho Judicial Council to investigate Kidwell's various ties.

We don't smell a scandal here – and we like to think our noses are attuned to it. No one knows how he'll vote on issues before the court.

And no one should expect Kidwell to take a walk on every vote that might involve a political ally. That's not what voters hired him to do. If Kidwell is going to recuse himself on every issue involving an ally (i.e., a Republican), he'll be the Supreme Court's answer to the Maytag repairman.

We've said it before. We'll say it again. Kidwell was elected to the state's highest court through a process that Idaho needs to reform. If you hold political elections for judicial spots, you will get politicians who are elected to judge. Every winner will have political ties.

When that happens, we will get complaints such as the one Hummel has filed. It's post-election politics.

One might even infer that Hummel's piety is designed to accomplish by innuendo what Idaho Democrats failed to get done in November. Kidwell, it seems to us, has only committed the offense of being a conservative in a more-liberal lawyer town.

And it bears note that Hummel, like Kidwell, has a history. A prominent member of the gay rights movement, Hummel has a pending case before the court involving a child adoption by a lesbian woman.

If you paint Kidwell by appearances, fairness says you paint Hummel, too. So here goes: is it possible that Hummel is trying to pressure Kidwell off the case? That would enable him to take his chances with the other four judges.

Imagine, a lawyer playing politics. We're shocked – yes, shocked – there is gambling in this establishment.

Good leaders aren't always good men

GEORGE F. WILL

As the Lewinsky Chapter in America's political conversation comes to a close, consider two changes it has accelerated. One is a revision of the job description of president. The other is the conservatives' collapse of confidence.

The first is partly the result of a conservative impulse, and partly a product of conservatives' excesses. The second requires conservatives to practice the cardinal virtue of their creed – prudence, which involves facing facts and distinguishing between those that can be changed and those that must be accommodated.

To begin understanding both changes, consider the three reasons why the public has steadily held to its judgment that Clinton is both a bad man and a good president.

First, conservatives, in their desire to dampen Americans' enthusiasm for government, have indiscriminately portrayed the political class as contemptible. The public has been convinced of that by conservatives, to a degree now inconvenient to conservatives, and so has not been scandalized by Clinton's scandals.

Second, between 1952 and 1988 Republicans controlled both houses of Congress only two years (1953-54) but won seven of 10 and five of the last six presidential elections during that span. Republicans held the presidency for all but 12 of the 40 years prior to 1992. As a result, conservatives became fixated on the presidency and opportunistically argued that social progress is a measure of presidential aptitude.

The quite unconservative premise – its pedigree traces to turn-of-the-century Progressives – is that government, particularly the executive branch of the central government, is the most important creative agency in society. So today's high approval by a content, prospering country of its president's job performance rests on an assumption that conservatives embraced.

Third, why are many conservatives shocked that the first modern nation, the United States, is embracing a distinction made by the founder of modern political thought, Machiavelli? In "The Prince," Machiavelli argued that one could be a "most excellent captain" without being "among the most excellent men." Time was, conservatives relished Conservative Prime Minister Harold Macmillan's answer when he was asked if he would give people moral direction. For that, he said, they should consult their bishops, not their politicians.

Machiavelli earned a bad reputation by severing the assessment of a politician's job performance from the assessment of his moral qualities. Less radical thinkers know that a morally exemplary leader is an occasional bonus in political life, and occasionally is imperative, but is not necessary for the functioning of a well-founded regime.

As James Madison wrote, with dry understatement, in Federalist 10, "Enlightened statesmen will not always be at the helm."

Clinton is surviving because the public wants him to for essentially conservative reasons. Conservatives, not recognizing the conservative roots of the public's reasoning, are disconcerted by this.

Some conservatives, in their almost clinical obsession with Clinton, are talking of themselves as victims of an unfair expropriation of their policy property. Cannot such conservatives hear their own lament? They are stealing the whiny language of contemporary liberalism.

Some conservatives who celebrate the working of markets in petroleum and potato chips seem to dislike market forces affecting political ideas. They complain when demand for a political program they advocate causes Clinton to move toward supplying what is demanded. But that is how things are supposed to work when conservatives succeed in moving the center of political gravity to the right.

Even before the Lewinsky Chapter began, many conservatives were upset with the public because that center had not moved enough to permit implementation of conservatives' plans for pruning government. Now Clinton is wielding his popularity to advocate a huge and potentially popular new entitlement – Medicare coverage of prescription drugs. This will reveal whether conservatives' capacity for persuasion has been crippled by self-pity.

Americans: Too dumb to be trusted

I'm angered to see the degree of ignorance and stupidity in America, as evidenced by so many agreeing with the contention that if Bill Clinton isn't daily on the job – protecting us all – we're all doomed. The Rev. Paul Moore stated: "... millions of people will suffer and die." Alan Dershowitz claims that votes for impeachment and removal "... will be a great victory for the forces of evil – genuine evil." Betty Friedan tells us: "... it's Clinton, not the Constitution, who protects and defends." In many minds, Clinton's not the president of the United States, he is the United States, and his greatness transcends any expectations of honesty and puts him above the Constitution he swore to uphold and defend.

Expecting the rise in approval ratings after the State of the Union address, I'm still surprised at the swoon generated by Clinton's transparent attempt at appeasing everyone in America by promising a fix for all our problems – by allowing an even more controlling government. The truly ludicrous aspect of that speech (beyond all the lies I counted) was the orgasmic response of the Democrats to Clinton's proposals for Social Security and education reform. These are the same reforms proposed by Republicans and fought by Clinton and liberals for years. Can we say hypocrites?

I guess we can expect nothing more from a party that can only defend their leader by dragging down our nation's past – truly great – leaders and aligning themselves with the most vile creature on this earth: Larry Flynt. He's the man Jesse Jackson anointed as "the new moral authority in America," and the man who says he won't disclose any more dark secrets if the Republicans stop the trial against Clinton. Hmm, can we say "blackmail" and "obstruction of justice"?

Bill Clinton demonstrated how this is all possible in his Jan. 20 speech in Buffalo. Answering a question why the surplus couldn't be given back to the taxpayers, he stated: "... we could give it all back to you and hope you spend it right, but ..." The liberal mind-set believes us too stupid to be trusted with our own money and, to their delight, to see the dishonor and despotic thinking of Bill Clinton. Looking at the polls, maybe the government should handle our lives for us.

Crump should be informed

We'd like to know what Steve Crump has against the Lost River Valley and Arco and the surrounding areas. I think in fairness you should have someone really find out what the area is like. Contrary to Steve Crump's opinion, there are some fine, intelligent people here.

We feel that maybe this isn't the world's worst disaster area. Lumping everything and everyone that lives here together with anything negative about the Idaho National Engineering and Environmental Laboratory is very shortsighted and stupid.

Newspapers usually rely on reliable sources and people before they write something as derogatory as the column he wrote on Jan. 10.

Reader questions GOP leaders

I have a question for our quick-to-condemn Republican leaders.

1. Why do seniors with minimum ($5.15 hour) have to pay the government to double dip on Social Security, Medicare? I took the time to contact Rep. Craig. He went to the Social Security office and mailed to me the existing rules as to why this is happening. Well, I know this! Here is a change for the stupid statesman (ha) to help, to no avail.

2. Veterans benefits for World War II vets to get a little more compensation on our Social Security checks. But he ignores the problem. All need his help and input. But it's not high priority enough for him to check on this type problem. No wonder I, for one, don't care for the Republican representation we have. No sensational headlines, no representation either.

Clinton is a dangerous leader

You've got to admit Bill Clinton put on one helluva show and that bothers me in light of the circumstances. When you back off and look at this picture, it's not pretty.

What Bill Clinton is advocating and driving for is a stronger government for a weaker people. Bill Clinton's government will be all-seeing, all-knowing, and the population will be like so many sheep. A socialistic police state in the making.

I think Bill Clinton is a dangerous man to have leading our nation.

Take the best, leave the rest

I personally called Klink's Florist in Burley and ordered a plant for the funeral of Doyle "Shrimp" Hatch. On the card, I had them put a specific name as to who was to take the plant as a memory of him.

The person for whom the plant was intended knew this and found the plant before the service. It was a beautiful spider plant.

When the burial was over, they returned to pick up the plant and it was gone. The card with my name was put in a small flowering plant.

Isn't it amazing that in the face of death that some choose to behave as they did in the life of the loved one – "take the best and leave the rest."

You know who you are, and I and my family hope you enjoy the plant.

It's cheaper to buy than hunt

Perfect world: No poaching (fish or game), no bad weather, no need for more farm ground, plenty of winter range for big game, plenty of winter cover for game birds, 100 percent wild fish propagation, clean clear water everywhere, unlimited sportsman access to public and private land.

Real world: Commercial and individual poaching (enforcement costs), Mother Nature (enough said), farmers trying to make a living, no such thing as waste water or ground any more, water is precious, less cover for game birds (HIP program costs), houses and development on traditional winter range (winter feeding and depredation costs), declining water quality, don't fish or swim in Rock Creek! (less wild fish propagation, more hatchery costs and it's not cheap, ask Clear Springs Trout Co.), slob hunters and fishermen (I decline to call them sportsmen) with no respect for others rights (land acquisition and trespass rights costs). The list goes on.

I guess what I'm trying to say is, compared to the cost of dinner and a movie, a round of golf and a couple of beers or a day on the slopes, the cost of a hunting and fishing license and appropriate tags would be cheap at twice the price if you consider the alternative. Let's face it; it's cheaper to buy your meat in the store than spend a week hunting for it in the woods, but that's not what it's all about now, is it?

Gore faces tough choices on road to the White House in 2000

LYN NOFZIGER

If one politician in America today has a right to be in a quandary, it's Vice President Al Gore.

He's at a fork in the road, and he must know it.

One direction could lead to the White House. The other leads to political oblivion.

One is represented by the roughly 70 percent of the voters who believe President Clinton is doing a good job and should be left alone to continue doing it.

The other leads to the roughly 70 percent who think Clinton lies, is untrustworthy and is a bad example for their children. Now, it is true that the groups overlap. In both are people who don't trust the president but don't want to rock the boat in a time of prosperity and peace.

So, as Clinton's heir apparent, Gore has this problem: Should he cast his lot with those who genuinely support Clinton and hope that they constitute a true majority? Should he go with those who don't trust Clinton and want someone they can trust in 2000? Or should he try, Clinton-fashion, to travel both roads at once?

These are tough choices for an ambitious politician, especially when he's spent six years being Clinton's aide and crony while trying to maintain a Boy Scout image.

Aside from a few gaffes such as lying about his role in the tobacco wars, Gore has maintained a reputation as a straight arrow. But he could lose this in a hurry if he were seen to be too avidly defending an indefensible president, especially if this were to occur at a time when voters were saying: We've tolerated Bill Clinton but we don't want another like him.

Ten years ago, George Bush was elected as the man who would carry on Ronald Reagan's legacy. When he didn't, he was soundly whipped by Clinton.

In turn, Clinton has ridden prosperity and political acumen to two terms and wild popularity, a legacy that under normal circumstances Gore could reasonably hope to inherit.

But Clinton has proved also to be a compulsive philanderer, a liar, and a president who may have perjured himself. Because of these things he faces the threat – remote but still real – of being removed from office.

And therein lies Gore's quandary.

He owes his job to the president. He owes any chance he has of being the next president to this president. Furthermore, Clinton has treated him as well as any president has ever treated his vice president. And a grateful Gore has publicly remained loyal to the core, even proclaiming on impeachment day that his boss will go down in history as one of our great presidents.

Surely then, if public sentiment begins to turn against Clinton and Gore remains firm in his support, there will be attempts to make him eat his words.

On the other hand, if Gore were now to become critical of Clinton or if silence on his part were to bespeak disapproval, his party's leaders and voters in general might well brand him as a traitor and an ingrate.

If this proves so, and if it turns out that the voters have had enough of political and personal chicanery and want an American hero as their next president, there are those in both parties who can meet that demand. On the Democratic side, Sen. Bob Kerrey of Nebraska and Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts are certified war heroes, and former New Jersey Sen. Bill Bradley comes to the campaign perhaps dull, but as spotless as a politician can get.

Should Gore get past this trio, the Republicans have their own war hero, Sen. John McCain, in the wings.

Because the presidential primary season has been pushed up to early spring of 2000, Gore has barely a year to devise a strategy to prove he is loyal to his president but is personally unstained by that loyalty. If he can do this, if he can travel both forks in the road at the same time, he could still carry through to the Democratic presidential nomination.

If this happens, there is no doubt that he will have earned it.

GOP fumbles the harassment ball

JAMES K. PINKERTON

Even as Republican senators search for a face-saving exit from the impeachment trial, one unintended consequence has already emerged: Conservatives have revalidated the sexual harassment laws that President Clinton did so much to invalidate.

The Grand Impeacher himself, Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., has elevated the one-way romance between Clinton and Monica Lewinsky into a precedent-setting event that will shape politics and the law for years to come. "There are issues of transcendent importance that you have to be willing to lose your job over," he told the Senate on Saturday.

But when the specific issue is the alleged violation of Paula Jones' civil rights in her case against the president, perhaps the Republicans should step back from the impeachment precipice and ask themselves: Do we really want to sacrifice our careers on the altar of Anita Hill's definition of sexual harassment?

No wonder sex harassment is a growth industry; the number of such cases filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has increased by 50 percent in the last six years, while the dollar total of damages has nearly tripled.

But all that improvement would be at risk, Rep. James Rogan, R-Calif., warned, if Clinton were not removed.

To be sure, according to the EEOC's sexual harassment guidelines, which Democrats brandished freely during the Clarence Thomas Supreme Court bearings in 1991, Clinton surely seems guilty. The agency defines sex harassment three ways, including a situation in which "Submission to or rejection of such conduct is used as the basis for employment decisions affecting such individual." So the mere fact that Monica rose from an unpaid pizza delivery girl to paid White House staffer to even higher-paid Pentagon paper-shuffler should have been enough to scramble EEOC enforcers into action.

Strangely, no such investigation has begun.

But is this what Republicans stand for? Do they really want to see every instance of flirtatious behavior become a federal case, as happened earlier this month when a Georgia woman took her $1-million harassment lawsuit against her daughter's school all the way to the Supreme Court?

From the beginning of the Clinton impeachment case, Republicans should have looked ahead to the end game.

Hog farms have rules

I have read several times recently that regulations are not in place in Idaho to monitor hog operations in our counties and our state. This is not true. Hog production units are regulated by the same Environmental Protection Agency, Division of Environmental Quality and county guidelines that apply to dairies and feedlots. These regulations are updated in a timely manner and are in place to protect our environment. As producers, we are in favor of regulatory protection for our environment. We drink the water and breathe the air too. We feel that Idaho regulations should be environmentally friendly, scientifically based and economically viable.

In 1997, under the auspices of the America's Clean Water Foundation, the EPA, U.S. Department of Agriculture, state regulators and pork producers met for nearly a year and hammered out a set of tough recommendations for pork producers of all sizes. It includes things like setbacks, nutrient management systems and construction standards for manure storage and application systems.

As a result, hog farmers will likely be the first in agriculture covered by new comprehensive EPA regulations that will be final in 1999. These regulations will cover every aspect of farm management, including the collection, storage and application of manure. They will apply to all operations, regardless of size. Any hog producer building anywhere in this country realizes they will have to comply with these regulations.

Local livestock producers already operate under a zero discharge rule. Section 319 of the Clean Water Act says it is against the law for any discharge from a hog operation to find its way into the groundwater or a stream, river or lake. Those who do so are subject to heavy fine. Just to put things into perspective, for every pound of nitrogen that is collected and applied to the land as fertilizer, two pounds is discharged legally by municipal sewage plants into U.S. water.

Nationwide, producers are spending their own money to ensure odor problems are solved as quickly as possible. We have invested significant time and dollars in programs that will make hog odor less offensive. Technologies to reduce odor are currently being tested on farms all across the nation to determine which ones will work best. I believe that, in the next few years, we will see a great deal of progress in this area.

Quake victims loot stores; hopes fade for survivors

ARMENIA, Colombia — Driven by hunger, survivors of a deadly earthquake dashed into supermarkets to strip their shelves clean Wednesday as shortages of food, water and antibiotics worsened the misery wrought by one of Colombia's worst disasters.

The toll from Monday's magnitude-6 earthquake in western Colombia reached 878 dead and more than 3,410 injured Wednesday, Red Cross spokeswoman Maria Perrelet said. That number was expected to rise as more debris was cleared.

Rescue teams arrived from Britain and the United States to help find survivors and pull bodies from hundreds of downed buildings in this city of 300,000 people. Using heavy machinery, rescuers uncovered corpses throughout Armenia, but hope of finding new survivors was dwindling fast.

With need overwhelming available supplies, Armenia's residents took matters into their own hands, breaking down the gates of a downtown supermarket and stealing rice, cooking oil, flour and rum.

Debris fell from the upper reaches of the damaged four-story building housing the store, sending panicked looters fleeing into the street in fear of aftershocks.

In all, 27 aftershocks have struck Colombia since Monday, and a 5.4-magnitude quake rocked the northeast Wednesday but caused no damage.

Luis Valderrama, 30, and two friends pushed a red supermarket cart loaded with goods down 19th Street toward their home in the El Pradito Bajo neighborhood.

"It isn't stealing. The store's totally destroyed, and nobody has a house, nobody has food. All this is to share with the people," he said.

Iraq accuses Arabs of giving U.S. the OK

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraq accused Arab governments Wednesday of giving the United States the "green light" to step up its military campaign against President Saddam Hussein's government.

And, in the latest show of official anger over lack of Arab support, Iraq's Parliament called on the people of Saudi Arabia and Kuwait to overthrow their rulers for supporting the U.S.-British airstrikes on Iraq last month.

Tensions have increased since the Dec. 16-19 bombardment, with Iraqi air defense units regularly sparring with U.S. planes patrolling the no-fly zones over northern and southern Iraq. The planes have responded by firing missiles. At least two errant missiles killed 11 civilians Monday, Iraqi officials say.

Albright pushes plan for Albanian self-rule

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia — Pledging to step up U.S. intervention in the Balkans, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright said Wednesday she is exploring a combination of military and political pressure to settle the violence in Kosovo.

Other Clinton administration officials said the aim is to force Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic to give ethnic Albanians in the Serbian province maximum control of their daily lives.

An official said Milosevic will be given no more than a matter of weeks to come to terms with Kosovo's ethic Albanians.

More than 1,000 lives have been lost in an 11-month conflict between Serb forces and Albanian separatists. Last October, Milosevic agreed to a cease-fire and to withdraw Serb troops and special police units from the province, which he is determined to keep in Yugoslavia.

Some of the troops and police have returned to Kosovo, thousands of ethnic Albanians have been displaced, there are reports of massacres of civilians, and Belgrade refuses to allow war crimes investigators to work.

Doctors: Hussein's cancer has recurred

AMMAN, Jordan — King Hussein has suffered a relapse of cancer, his doctors said Wednesday, one day after the Jordanian monarch appointed his eldest son as crown prince and flew to the United States for treatment.

The 63-year-old king was readmitted to the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., for treatment of a relapse of non-Hodgkins lymphoma, according to a joint statement from Lt. Gen. Samir Farraj, the king's private physician, and his team of clinic doctors.

The statement said the king was in stable condition Wednesday.

Hussein arrived at the Mayo Clinic on Tuesday night. He was taken from his royal jet in a wheelchair. He had spent the last six months in Minnesota receiving chemotherapy and a bone marrow cell transplant for the non-Hodgkins lymphoma.

Globe theater will use male Cleopatra

LONDON — Shakespeare's Globe theater will include a male Cleopatra in its line-up this summer — with artistic director Mark Rylance himself playing the celebrated Egyptian queen.

"It's not going to be camp. She's very playful," Rylance said Wednesday in unveiling a summer season of plays that will include the Bard's "Julius Caesar" and "The Comedy of Errors," as well as "Antony and Cleopatra," opening July 30.

The Rylance Cleopatra is likely to be the talking point of the four-play season, two of which will be performed entirely by men in keeping with practices in Shakespeare's own time.

"It doesn't seem very politically correct, does it?" said Rylance, 39, who has yet to cast an Antony to appear opposite him. "I'm already thinking about how can I balance this."

IRA exposé author found dead by road

BELFAST, Northern Ireland — The author of an unflinching exposé of life inside the Irish Republican Army was found dead by a roadside Wednesday, the victim of a savage beating that inevitably suggested revenge.

The battered body of Eamon Collins was found at dawn near the town of Newry, 40 miles south of Belfast. His head was so badly damaged that police weren't immediately sure whether he had been shot.

Collins, the IRA's former intelligence officer in Newry from 1980 to 1985, had returned to the border town four years ago despite making lasting enemies in the outlawed group.

In 1995, IRA supporters torched his car. Last year, they knocked him over with a car. Two months ago, they torched his new home.

ISU declares Anderson academically ineligible

POCATELLO – Idaho State University freshman forward Brandon Anderson has been declared academically ineligible and will miss the remainder of the Bengals' men's basketball season, school officials reported Wednesday.

Anderson started in two outings this season, and made appearances in another 10 games, averaging 2.7 points and 1.8 rebounds for the 4-14 Bengals.

"It's an unfortunate situation with Brandon," said ISU coach Doug Oliver. "But now he can concentrate harder on the academic side of things."

High schools need umpires for baseball, softball

BURLEY – Anyone interested in umpiring high school baseball or softball should contact district commissioner Craig Mills at 678-6606 (days) or 678-7144 (evenings).

The state baseball and softball rules clinics are scheduled for Feb. 22 at Twin Falls High School. New umpires are encouraged to call.

Simplot honors FloJo with ISU track scholarship

POCATELLO – A gift from the J.R. Simplot Co. will honor the memory of the late Olympic sprint champion Florence Griffith Joyner, as well as provide scholarships for Idaho State University women's track team members.

Simplot sponsors The Simplot Games, one of the nation's largest high school track meets, and Griffith Joyner, known as FloJo, and her husband, Al Joyner, attended three of the meets.

The Simplot Games-Florence Griffith Joyner Memorial Scholarship is a $2,500 annual gift, which will be awarded in perpetuity to women who are or will be members of the ISU track and field team and who have previously competed in The Simplot Games.

Teams face light week; meet TVCC Chukars tonight

By Damen Cloe
Times-News writer

TWIN FALLS – It's been quite awhile since both the College of Southern Idaho men's and women's basketball teams have been on the same page heading into a conference weekend.

But that's the way it's been at the CSI gym in preparation for the week's sole game against Scenic West Athletic Conference mates partner Treasure Valley Community College.

The conference-leading CSI women are coming off a last-second win against Salt Lake Community College and a 12-point win over Utah Valley State College, while the men continued their turnaround with upsets of the Bruins and the 18th-ranked Wolverines.

The Golden Eagles last played the Chukars in Ontario, Ore. Dec. 11. Coach Joel Bate's women's squad rode early rallies in both halves for a 54-40 win, while the CSI men suffered their third conference setback in as many games in a 62-54 loss.

"I think when played them over there, we were checked out for Christmas break and watching film; I think the girls even realized they didn't play as hard as they could," Bate said.

"I think we pressure a lot better and putting defensive pressure off the ball much better than we did at Treasure Valley," Bate continued. "And I think were shooting a lot better right now."

The Chukar women (9-11, 1-8 in conference) are led by Tara Keller, the SWAC's fourth-leading scorer at 15.6 points per game. Sarah Nelson of CSI (16-5, 8-1) is just above that at 15.8.

Golden Eagle Katarina Gabaniova and Chukar Beth Klapprich, who played as a freshman at CSI last year, are the top two shotblockers in the conference.

Bruins topple Indians 48-45

Last-second free throw puts girls over the top

By Ellen Wintzer
Times-News writer

TWIN FALLS – The Indians were within two points with 40 seconds left on the clock and their chances looked bright.

But 220 Amanda Birdi free throw rimmed off that light at the eight-second mark, giving the Bruins a 48-45 win Wednesday.

"Twin Falls did a good job of stopping up at the end with their free throws," said Buhl coach Joe Shepard. "They had some good, tough defense in the first half."

The Bruins dominated the first half 23-7. The Indians only had two field goals in that spurt, but made up for the distribution the second half of the game.

"Buhl had a good run," said Twin Falls coach Lawrence Priefferle. "We didn't defend well."

Buhl rallied with a 15-point burst, led by Hattie Hixon with five points. Erin Scott then came off the bench to score four more with two minutes left in the third. Camie Williamson topped off the quarter with a 3-point goal, bringing the Indians within four points of the Bruins.

"The key was the start of the second half," Shepard said. "We were in foul trouble and Hixon and Leah were on the bench. The girls did a good job and got us back into the game."

Williamson began the fourth quarter with another 3-point goal, connecting shots for Bre Bruins, Keri Coats and Marcie Danielson.

The rest of Buhl's game was left up to Scott and Moore. Scott scored 10 of her 18 points in the fourth, while Moore followed with 4-of-4 accuracy at the line. Rebounding efforts weren't enough.

With time running down, the Indians had no fouls the Twin Falls team – but they happened to find the wrong player.

Hixon Christie Pais used Scott's points, her strength coming from the free-throw

Magic Valley schools assume 2 top spots in Idaho AP poll

By Damen Cloe
Times-News writer

Magic Valley schools boasted two top teams in the Associated Press Idaho high school boys' basketball poll this week.

Kimberly ((12-1) took advantage of Snake River's second defeat of the season – an 86-82 overtime loss at home to Preston last Tuesday – and was voted No. 1 among A-2 schools in the weekly poll by the state's sportswriters and broadcasters.

Carey ((13-2), meanwhile, rode a pair of conference wins over Camas County and Shoshone into the top spot among the smallest schools, as Mackay lost its only game off the week, 59-56, at Rockland.

Pocatello (14-2) lost to unranked Idaho Falls, but did not move from the top spot in Class A-1, as No. 2 Eagle (13-4), No. 3 Capital (13-4), and No. 4 Rigby (14-3) all lost to unranked opponents and simply swayed pat.

The only new team in any classification was Cathedral (12-3), which took over the fifth spot among the biggest schools after Lewiston vacated it with a one-point loss at Sandpoint.

With their overtime loss, the Panthers (12-2) fell to second behind Kimberly. St. Maries (9-2) jumped two spots in third after winning all three of its games last week. The Lumberjacks replace Kuna, whose two-point loss at Emmett sent the Kavemen (10-3) down to fifth.

Payette (11-2) stayed in fourth place in A-2, one of seven teams to hold its position.

The only No. 1 not to lose last week Melba (12-1) took eight first-place votes in Class A-3. The other five went to No. 2 Firth (13-1), which moved up one spot to No. 2 with three wins, including a 50-point decision at home over North Fremont.

Declo beat Valley in the week's only matchup of ranked Magic Valley teams, and the Hornets (11-3) moved up a spot to third while the Vikings (13-2) fell two spots to fourth.

Lapwai (12-2) stayed in the No. 3 spots with wins over Prairie and Wallace.

The biggest drop of a top-ranked team came in Class A-4, where Mackay's slip cost the Miners (8-2) two spots. Wilder (8-3) moved up two runs to second after handing Geem State its first loss of the season.

The Jaguars (13-1) fell two spots to fifth and Rockland (9-2) moved up one spot to fourth.

Plot thickens up North

Camas stays in hunt, eliminates Bliss

The Times-News

CAREY – And then there were five.

The pool of six Northside contenders for this season's A-4 state girls' basketball berths pared itself by one Wednesday night, as Camas County's defense befuddled Bliss and dealt the Lady Bears their second and final loss of the tournament.

After clinging to a narrow 6-4 lead through one quarter, the Mushers outscored Bliss a decisive 13-2 in the second.

In the evening's other game, Shoshone improved its tournament record to a perfect 2-0 beating the same Carey squad that pummeled the Mushers by a score of 56-35 the night prior.

As was the case in the night's early contest, the second quarter of Wednesday's second game proved pivotal. After outscoring the Indians 9-6 in the first period, the Panthers managed just one point in the second and never regained the lead.

The girls have a bye today. When varsity play resumes Friday, Carey will meet Richfield at 6 p.m., and Dietrich will play Shoshone at 7:30 p.m.

Camas County 39, Bliss 15

Scoring troubles continued to plague the Bears, who posted just 11 points through the first three quarters of play and received a scoring contribution of more than four points from just one player.

Freshman guard Samantha Allen's team-high five was not enough.

Bliss had a hard time moving the ball under Camas County's uptempo pressure. The Mushers, meanwhile, enjoyed eight-point performances from both junior Maggi Bennett and freshman Sarah Vouch.

Team fouls – Bliss 15. Camas County 16

Shoshone 43, Carey 36

One day after dispatching Camas County to the nether side of the tournament bracket, Carey was undone against Shoshone by a cold-shooting second quarter in which the Panthers scored only one point.

"It was a good defensive game all the way," said Carey coach Dick Simpson. "But we passed up a lot of good opportunities and just couldn't get the ball to fall."

Jennifer Ross was high-scorer in the game for the Indians, notching 11 points, while Amy Williams followed with nine. Jenny Royal and Kristy Barton each poured in eight for the Panthers.

CSI

The CSI men (13-8) stand at 5-4 in conference after starting the season 0-3. Treasure Valley is a game behind in conference and 11-10 overall.

In the Dec. 11 game, the teams were tied at halftime and CSI led by six with 11 minutes remaining before the Chukars scored 13 uninterrupted points over the next four minutes and never trailed.

Brandon Burney had 23 points for TVCC that night, and has since had nights of 47 points (against Walla Walla), 38 points (against North Idaho College), 32 points (against Eastern Utah), 31 points (against Ricks) and 25 points (against Colorado Northwestern).

"The big key is you still have to control Burney," said CSI men's coach Kevin Jones. "We didn't control him like we wanted to. We'll throw different looks at him."

"Chrisie did a good job at the free-throw line," Pfefferle said. "This was a good win for us. Our team's been sick, but we hung on until the end."

Twin Falls improves to 8-11 and travels to Hillcrest on Friday. Buhl finishes the season at 14-6 and begins district play on Monday at Buhl.

Mauresmo shocks Davenport

MELBOURNE, Australia (AP) – Lindsay Davenport thought she was playing a man – a player so muscular, so quick, so relentless she was overwhelming.

France's broad-shouldered Amelie Mauresmo emerged as the latest teen sensation to invade women's tennis, reaching the Australian Open final as Davenport yielded to her power and youth in the brutal heat.

Mauresmo, the 19-year-old former junior Wimbledon and French champion, reeled off six of her nine aces in the final set as she wore down the U.S. Open champion Wednesday 4-6, 7-5, 7-5.

The thick, humid heat slowed down the court so that it played more like clay, an advantage for Mauresmo, who beat Davenport on clay in their only other meeting in Germany last year.

"I couldn't touch some of those serves at the end, and that made the difference," said Davenport, who hadn't dropped even a set in a Grand Slam match since the quarterfinals of Wimbledon last year. "Her shoulders looked huge to me, maybe because she was wearing a tank top."

Mauresmo had plenty of confidence coming into this one-hour, 56-minute match.

"The biggest thing was that I knew I could beat her," said Mauresmo, who shrugged off Davenport's comparisons of her to a man.

"Perhaps the fact that I'm strong physically is maybe impressing her. It means that I'm a very solid player, so I take it as a compliment."

Mauresmo said she works out hard in the gym "to be the one who stays out longer on the court."

Among the men, the Australian semifinalists hail from Ecuador, Russia, Sweden and Germany, and even in those countries they are not household names.

The baby-faced kid from Ecuador, Nicolas Lapentti, is ranked No. 91, and the closest he ever came to a Grand Slam trophy is gazing at one in the house of his neighbor and hero in Guayaquil, 1990 French Open champ Andres Gomez.

Lapentti, 22, plays Thomas Enqvist, a 24-year-old Swedish journeyman who will never be confused with Stefan Edberg, Mats Wilander or Bjorn Borg. In seven years on the tour, Enqvist lost in the first round of majors seven times, the second round five times and the third round four times.

The Russian is Yevgeny Kafelnikov, the only player with a Grand Slam credential – on the French red clay in 1996 – and the only semifinalist who was seeded, coming in at No. 10.

IDAHO FALLS – The Minico Spartans came out with intensity and led after the first quarter, but went cold in the middle periods as they fell to the Bonneville Bees in girls' non-conference basketball action Wednesday night.

Minico charged back in the fourth period, but the deficit was too large. Ashley Jolley led the Spartans with 16 points.

The game marked the end of the regular season for the Spartans, who will face Jerome in the first round of the Region III tournament on Monday.

Andersen makes up for miss

MIAMI (AP) – Morten Andersen knows what it's like to be a great kicker known for a momentous miss.

Until last week, Andersen's most famous kick was a shanked chip shot that let Jacksonville reach the NFL playoffs in 1997, leading to the Jaguars' even more shocking run to the AFC championship game.

"I felt bad about it because it was the last kick of the season and I had a whole year to think about it," said Andersen, a member of the NFL's Team of the Decade in the '80s who has been just as good, or better, in the '90s. "It was a humbling experience, but I finally realized one kick should not define a career."

On Jan. 17, Andersen put that bad memory to bed with a 38-yarder in overtime that sent the Atlanta Falcons to their first Super Bowl. Just a few minutes earlier, Minnesota's Gary Anderson missed his first kick of the entire season, a field goal that would have given the Vikings a 10-point lead with barely two minutes remaining.

That miss kept the Falcons' hopes alive, but Andersen knew just how Anderson felt.

"It was a tremendous year for him – not missing a field goal or extra point – but I think he missed it because it was our time," Andersen said. "I don't know if you can call it fate, but the way we played all year long, we willed it to happen."

Morten Andersen

Andersen, an eight-time Pro Bowler, has kicked more field goals than anyone in NFL history except Anderson. And his 17 years in the NFL have been nothing if not fateful.

An exchange program between his native Denmark and the United States landed him in Indianapolis, where an open tryout landed him on his high school team. His kicking game led him to Michigan State and finally to the New Orleans Saints and Falcons.

"The reason I came here was to open my mind and get good exposure to a different culture, language and people," Andersen said. "I've never been what you call a 'football player.' In high school, I would kick off and haul myself to the sideline as fast as I could. Covering kicks is still not something I cherish. I rely on the other 10 guys to do their thing.

"However, I did crush Deion Sanders when I was on the Saints and he was on the Falcons. Actually, I just knocked him out of bounds."

Atlanta's surprising run to the Super Bowl did cost Denmark its most famous color commentator.

For the previous seven years, Andersen worked on the live Danish telecast of the Super Bowl. But low advertising rates for the post-midnight broadcast prompted the nationwide station, TV3, to drop the game this season.

That is, until Andersen kicked the Falcons into Sunday's championship.

"I'd like the Danish people to feel like they're part of it," he said. "Even though I'm a small part of the team, I want them to be excited that Denmark is involved."

Anderson said his commentating is no threat to John Madden.

"It was strange because you have to work from the U.S. network video feed," Andersen said. "Madden would circle a guy's stomach and you didn't know if he was talking about what he had for dinner. So you would be at their mercy as far as commentary.

"I'm glad to be on the other side of the microphones this year."

How 'bout world peace, ending hunger?

MIAMI (AP) – Two years ago, Randall Cunningham was laying tile during a one-year hiatus from football.

On Wednesday, the Minnesota Vikings quarterback was stunned to hear his name called as the league's player of the year. "I felt like Miss America sitting there," he said. "This is one of the greatest achievements I've ever received."

Broncos are healthy despite injuries

As has been their routine since being slapped with a hefty fine by the NFL in November, the Denver Broncos issued a lengthy injury list on Wednesday.

This week's 17 players included Elway (ribs), Terrell Davis (groin), Steve Atwater (shoulder), Neil Smith (abdomen), Darrien Gordon (shoulder) and Howard Griffith (knee).

All are probable, and will likely see substantial playing time Sunday. So why list them? For failing to list Elway prior to the San Diego game on Nov. 8, the Broncos were fined $15,000.

Notes from Miami

Atlanta police have all hands on deck

ATLANTA – Atlanta will have all its police officers on duty Sunday night and early Monday in anticipation of a win by the Atlanta Falcons in the Super Bowl.

"We expect a celebratory mood after the game ends, and we pride ourselves on being a nonviolent city," said Nick Gold, a spokesman for the mayor's office. "Keep in mind that this is the birthplace of civil rights and the nonviolent movement in America."

Not to mention the first Olympic terrorist bombing on American soil. All hands on deck!

Party with the Worm and Carmen, dude

There's no word on how fast tickets are going for the party Dennis Rodman and Carmen Electra will co-host tonight at Liquid on South Beach. The $30 admission charge allows access to the Triple-X No-No Room, the Retro Drag Room and the Funk Room.

Note: Last time anyone heard, Rodman and Electra were still worm and wife.

Tune in and tune out

A national fans group is calling for a massive "mute out" of Sunday's halftime show.

The National Sports Fan Union is asking television viewers to turn off the program in protest of being taken for granted. "In a sports world featuring lockouts, outrageous ticket prices, and owners holding cities hostage for new stadiums."

SPORTS IN BRIEF

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. – Juli Inkster and Karrie Webb shared the first-round lead Wednesday in the LPGA's Office Depot golf tournament, posting 5-under-par 67s on adjacent courses.

Inkster made five birdies in a bogey-free round on the 6,195-yard Heritage, while Webb had six birdies and one bogey on the 6,277-yard Legend.

NEW YORK – Jim Abbott found a new home Wednesday with the Milwaukee Brewers and Carlos Baerga signed with the St. Louis Cardinals.

Riley, Heat want Rodman, if he behaves

MIAMI – Miami Heat coach Pat Riley wants to sign Dennis Rodman – if he'll follow team rules.

Rodman talked about retirement last week, then said he would play for the league minimum in Miami or Orlando. The Magic reportedly aren't interested.

Mavericks sign forward Cedric Ceballos

DALLAS – Forward Cedric Ceballos, who failed to land a big-money contract in the free-agent market, returned to the Dallas Mavericks with a one-year contract Wednesday.

Ceballos, 29, was acquired in a trade with Phoenix last season. He averaged 16.9 points and six rebounds in 12 games with Dallas before sustaining a season-ending knee injury.

Grizzlies sign Abdur-Rahim to huge extension

VICTORIA, British Columbia – The Vancouver Grizzlies, who've suffered through three dismal NBA seasons, solidified their future by signing Shareef Abdur-Rahim to a $71 million, six-year contract extension on Wednesday.

Abdur-Rahim, 22, who led the Grizzlies in scoring in his first two seasons, was in the final year of his rookie contract. He would have been eligible for free agency after this season, and the Bulls had expressed interest.

Duke-N.C. game closer than expected

DURHAM, N.C. (AP) – It wasn't one of the classics in the Duke-Carolina rivalry but it was a lot closer a lot longer than many thought it would be.

No. 2 Duke beat No. 10 North Carolina 89-77 Wednesday night, the Blue Devils' 15th straight victory overall and their 33rd in a row at Cameron Indoor Stadium.

In the rivalry of the schools just eight miles apart, Duke (20-1, 8-0 Atlantic Coast Conference) had lost 10 of the previous 12 meetings, including two of three last season.

This one was supposed to be a blowout as Duke was a 17-point favorite. The Tar Heels (17-5, 5-3) stayed right with the Blue Devils until a dry spell from the field for almost 5 1/2 minutes in the second half allowed Duke to pull away to its biggest victory in the series since 1993.

Ademola Okulaja scored down low to give North Carolina a 68-65 lead with 8:58 to play. Duke went on a 12-1 run as the Tar Heels went 5:27 without a field goal.

When freshman Kris Lang hit a hook in the lane to bring North Carolina within 77-72 with 3:21 left, the Cameron Crazies were able to explode just 32 seconds later when Trajan Langdon hit his third 3-pointer of the game to give Duke an 80-72 lead.

The points were the most the Tar Heels have scored in an ACC game this season and even holding Duke, the leading scoring team in the country, five points below their average wasn't enough in a steamy Cameron Indoor Stadium.

Duke's William Avery barely prevailed in the matchup with North Carolina point guard Ed Cota. Avery finished with 21 points and five assists, while Cota had 20 points and seven assists and the two went at each other all game long. Avery, who had seven turnovers in the first half in the overtime win over St. John's on Sunday, finished with just one, while Cota, who was bothered by leg cramps, had five.

bowlers scored highest: an average of 129, 29 points above the average.

Golfers did the worst at 97, finishing behind everyone from racquet ball players (121) to soccer players (100).

I'm speechless!

MV Volleyball Club commands sound seeding

TWIN FALLS – The Magic Valley Volleyball Club's 18-year-old Black Team competed in its first tournament of the season on Jan. 22-23 in Salt Lake City.

The group placed first in Friday's pool play, and finished No. 13 out of 32 teams at the two-day seeding tournament. This impressive result for such a young team propelled them into Division I of the Intermountain Volleyball Association for the next tournament.

Team members include: Amy and Tami Bennett, Annie Conover, Keri Coats, Jill Deagle, Lisa Levings, Lyndsy Phillips and Shawna Lancaster. The team is coached by Chris Clark.

Ski for charity: Fight diabetes on the slopes

The Times-News

TWIN FALLS – The Diabetes Center Foundation and Soldier Mountain Ski Area are co-sponsoring and seeking ski and snowboard entrants for the second-annual Downhilling for Diabetes fund-raising event, set for Feb. 27 at Soldier Mountain.

Participants enjoy an exceptional day of skiing or boarding while raising money for a worthwhile cause. Last year's inaugural running of the event far exceeded organizers' expectations, raising more that $8,000 for Magic and Wood River valley children and teens with diabetes.

Skiers and snowboarders of all skill levels and ages are encouraged to enter. Prizes will be awarded in numerous categories, so participants have a good chance of leaving an award regardless of age or ability. Business groups, school clubs and families may enter as teams, but individuals are also welcome.

The event will run Saturday, Feb. 27 from 9:30 a.m. until 3 p.m., with an awards reception to follow in the lodge at 4 p.m.

Entry forms and rules can be picked up at Claude's Sports, Elevation Sports or at Soldier Mountain. For more information, call Brad Newbry at 733-5038, or Ann Bybee at 733-3700, Ext. 174.

St. Joe's hoop dreams: Starting a business

PHILADELPHIA (AP) – Like many coaches, St. Joseph's Phil Martelli didn't like a new NCAA rule allowing athletes to work during the school year. He didn't think there were enough hours in the day to attend class, study, practice and hold down a job.

So the St. Joe's coach came up with a way for his players to earn money. Now, seven St. Joe's players are running a small novelty-item business called Hawk-Hoop-Co.

"I told the players that there was a risk, that they did not have to be part of it," Martelli said. "If they buy a product and the product costs $5 and they only raise $4, well, then they're going to have to figure out a way to get the dollar to pay for their bill."

Roller hockey makes resurgence

SAN JOSE, Calif. (AP) – After a one-year sabbatical to restructure the league and change half its teams, Roller Hockey International officials said Wednesday they will resume play this June with 10 franchises in the United States.

The reconfigured league that features players on in-line skates will have teams in Anaheim, Buffalo, Chicago, Dallas, Miami, Minnesota, Las Vegas, St. Louis, San Jose and Utah.

Only the San Jose Rhinos, Anaheim Bullfrogs, Buffalo Wings, Minnesota Blue Ox and Saint Louis Vipers remain from 1997. Franchises dropped since then are Los Angeles, New York/New Jersey, Orlando (moved to Miami), Ottawa and Sacramento.

The league called off the 1998 season because of economic problems that left only three teams ready to play last year. Now, there's a new national TV contract and the league will pay all player and coach salaries as well as teams' travel costs.

"The game and the product and the fan support were there, but the finances weren't there," new league president Bernie Mullin said. "The league ran out of money because it used its money to bail out a couple of bad franchises."

The league will provide about $3.5 million – an average of $350,000 per team – for salaries and travel costs. That money will come from the national TV contract and national advertising. The league also will keep expansion fees from future teams.

Wendell woman faces felony charge

GOODING – A Wendell woman faces a March 9 preliminary hearing in Gooding County Magistrate Court on a felony vehicular manslaughter charge stemming from the December 1998 death of an elderly Wendell resident, Gooding County Prosecutor Phil Brown said.

Kristy Murphy, 23, was turning her Ford F-150 pickup from Idaho Highway 46 into an open intersection at Main Street in Wendell on Dec. 19, 1998, Brown said. At the same time, Mary Yost, 75, was riding an adult-sized tricycle south across Main Street, he said.

Police reports say Murphy's right front bumper hit Yost's trike, and Yost was thrown to the street and run over by the pickup's right rear wheel, Brown said. Murphy told police she did not see Yost until it was too late, Brown said.

A team of emergency medical technicians happened to be nearby, and immediately began working on Yost, but she was pronounced dead at an area hospital later that day, Brown said.

Applications available for military academies

TWIN FALLS – High school students can obtain applications for the nation's military academies from Rep. Mike Simpson's local office.

"These nominations give top-quality Idaho students the opportunity for a first-rate college education and a possible jumpstart on a good career," Simpson said. "Idaho consistently ranks among the top states in the quality of its nominations, and we'll be looking to continue that record."

Students wishing to attend an academy must apply for a nomination from one – and only one – of their congressional representatives. All seniors may apply. Juniors can apply during or after January of their junior year. Simpson suggests students apply early.

Simpson's local office is at 628 Blue Lakes Blvd. N., Twin Falls, 83301. The phone number is 734-7219.

His Washington, D.C., office is at 1440 Longworth HOB, Washington, 20515. The phone number is 202-225-5531.

Doctor: ARTEC needs help from business

Coalition member addresses Rotary Club

The Times-News

TWIN FALLS – Business people need to help a Magic Valley technical high school program get down to business, a Twin Falls surgeon said Wednesday.

The Advanced Regional Technical Coalition needs business people to tell educators what skills are needed in future workers, surgeon David McClusky told the Twin Falls Rotary Club Wednesday. McClusky is working with the coalition and earlier this month attended a tour of technical academies in Virginia and Cincinnati.

The coalition of educators and business people is considering a program to provide courses to junior and senior high school students in the areas of automotive, information technology, electronics, finance, travel and tourism, construction and health occupations.

One successful example of bringing school and business together was a health occupations course at Twin Falls High School, McClusky said. In this case, the business was the Twin Falls Clinic & Hospital, with which he is associated.

Of the students that have taken the 8-year-old health course, 85 percent are working in health care or seeking more education in the field, he said. Five students work part-time at the clinic as nursing aides.

The clinic is set up to televise operations live as part of the course, said McClusky, who teaches one day a week.

The interactive course also is beamed through the College of Southern Idaho telecommunications system to Jerome, Valley and Gooding high schools. Between 60 to 100 health-care professionals speak to students annually, and students must make the grade in academics and attitude, and donate their time to community service, he said.

ARTEC planners have looked at the course as a model.

ARTEC would lead students to a certificate for employment or more schooling in that field, McClusky said. The program will target the 85 percent of students who don't go to college or a technical school after graduation.

"This is a kind of a different outlook than voc-ed," he said.

ARTEC is seeking startup money from a $6 million J.A. & Kathryn Albertson Foundation grant.

In addition to doing a good job of preparing the students to go to work for them, businesses might even consider financial support of ARTEC after the seed money is gone.

"It's a true area where business can make a difference," McClusky said. "The thing that is missing more than anything else is the involvement of business."

ARTEC is not meant to divert students into just one track of learning.

"What it does is, it just opens opportunities for them," he said.

Selling tobacco to minors carries major fine

New law means changes for all purchases

By Brian Haynes
Times-News writer

TWIN FALLS – Tobacco sellers have heard them all.

"I just forgot my ID. Come on, I'm old enough."

"I didn't get carded yesterday."

"Just sell them to me. I won't tell anyone."

No matter what the excuse is, smokers who look younger than 27 and don't have identification will have a tougher time buying tobacco.

The reason: A revised state law that took effect Jan. 1 can cost a store thousands of dollars in fines and lost revenue if it sells tobacco to a minor.

About 90 Magic Valley tobacco sellers learned the consequences of selling to minors, and how to avoid them, at a Wednesday seminar by the Coalition for Responsible Tobacco Retailers.

The coalition sponsors the "We Card" program, a nationwide effort to discourage underage tobacco buying and protect retailers' ability to sell tobacco, seminar leader Linda McKenna said.

With state authorities planning at least two sting operations per store per year, retailers can't

Rupert police sell used guns

Proceeds to go toward purchase of new arms

By John T. Huddy
Times-News writer

RUPERT – The Rupert Police Department received $1,600 to buy new guns, by selling 22 used guns to a Rupert pawn shop.

The Trading Post, which sells new and used firearms, placed a bid of $1,600 on the guns, including rifles and handguns. Pro-Arms Inc. of Utah bid $1,400. The department took the better price, Police Chief James Jackson said.

"There were several pretty good guns sold," Jackson said. "Lots of departments do this. It's an accepted practice."

Dave Pinther owns The Trading Post with his wife, Mary Ann. Pinther agreed the sale was a pretty good deal – for both the department and their store.

"I'd rather buy the guns than see them destroyed," Pinther said. "People think that the bad guys buy the guns from us, but they don't. We have to do a background check on every person before we can sell a gun."

Twin Falls police destroyed 174 firearms and air rifles in December, as part of the city's crime prevention and reduction program. The guns were either seized or unclaimed property that built up over the past two years.

Rather than destroying its collection of firearms, the Rupert department chose to sell them instead, Jackson said.

"The money will be used to buy three new handguns for reserve officers who have to use their own guns right now," Jackson said. "We have six reserve officers. We'll have enough money to buy at least three of the .40-caliber firearms that cost about $500 apiece. Right now we only have one gun they can use."

The department also will take bids on another batch of old guns and firearm parts. Several shotguns, pellet guns and spare parts will be put up for bid sometime next week, Jackson said.

Police hope to get at least $600 from the next batch. This money also will be used for the purchase of one or two new handguns for the reserves, Jackson said.

Pinther has owned The Trading Post for the past two years. This is the first time he has bought guns from the department, he said.

"They're pretty nice guns," Pinther said. "Nothing really expensive, though."

Many were in good condition, needing little or no repair. The price was reasonable, Pinther said.

The money wasn't the only part of the deal that was positive, Jackson said.

"It's always nice when somebody in the local area purchases the guns," Jackson said. "It cuts back on the price of having to ship them out of state, which can be pretty expensive."

Bids for the next batch of guns and parts will be announced at the City Council meeting Monday, Jackson said.

Hansen tries again; exiting standards evolve

The Times-News

BOISE – Though just three of more than 170 proposed school-exiting standards relate to evolution, any discussion about the plan inevitably turns to the subject.

A joint legislative education committee meeting Wednesday was no different.

After a comprehensive presentation of how the standards are being created, a couple of legislators echoed concerns heard around the state during a series of public hearings.

Obviously seasoned on the issue, Larry Andrews, chairman of the commission charged with developing the standards, assured the committee the standards won't limit what students can know or believe, they simply isolate knowledge and skills deemed essential to succeed in a rapidly changing world.

The State Board of Education hopes to have a final draft of the standards by this spring and an implementation plan by the end of summer.

Robert Stuart, Oregon Trail update school board on goals

By Jennifer Sandmann
Times-News writer

TWIN FALLS – Academic goals, crisis preparedness and technology were points of focus as the Twin Falls School Board on Wednesday asked principals about progress in their schools.

Oregon Trail Elementary School Principal Ted Poppelwell and Robert Stuart Junior High School Principal Craig Ainsworth and Vice Principal Gene Clemens were the first district principals to address the board. Other principals will attend meetings throughout the remainder of the school year.

The School Board has placed more emphasis in recent years on test scores, Chairwoman Vera Redman said.

And last year the district devoted a day at the end of the school year for faculty to evaluate test information and set goals.

"We had a math goal, a language arts goal and a science goal," Poppelwell told the board.

Groups call for director's ouster

BOISE (AP) — Two environmental groups Wednesday urged the Idaho Fish and Game Commission to dismiss agency Director Steve Mealey for failing to promote proper wildlife management.

Idaho Watersheds Project and the Committee for Idaho's High Desert on submitted a letter to the commissioners' meeting in Boise.

While the alleged muzzling of his fisheries staff against commenting on salmon and steelhead was the catalyst, his long-term failure to protect wildlife was the chief reason for the letter, the groups said.

They claimed the Fish and Game Department submitted inadequate recommendations for wildlife and fish habitat oversight in the U.S. Bureau of Land Management's Owyhee Resource Area. The report was sent in four months after an extended deadline had passed, they said.

The environmentalists also contend Mealey has not addressed the steep decline in sage grouse populations and habitat.

BURLEY

Lydia V. Malone

And a cure was not to be.

A golden heart stopped beating;
Hard-working hands put to rest.
God broke our hearts to prove to us,
He only takes the best.

Residents rate value of clean water

BOISE (AP) — Protecting the state's natural resources is a high priority for residents, second only to a basic education, according to a water quality survey by University of Idaho researchers.

The 17th report from the Idaho Forest, Wildlife and Range Policy Analysis Group covered opinions about nonpoint source pollution, the sediment and other contaminants pouring off farms, logging sites and other operations.

The Legislature initiated the group in 1989 as a way for the Moscow school to respond quickly to requests for information.

Idaho citizens favor having polluters pay the costs of control. Water is an important issue and many, if not all, residents would accept a modest increase in gasoline or sales tax to pay for water quality programs.

The survey found 58 percent of Idaho citizens favored maintaining natural resources, trailing the 74 percent support for an education from kindergarten through high school.

Improving the water quality was runner-up among those resources, drawing a 61 percent majority, exceeded by 71 percent backing air quality.

Seventy-seven percent put a high priority on protecting household water supplies, 56 percent on water for agriculture, 47 percent for wildlife, 41 percent for fish habitat, 31 percent for scenic value, 24 percent for industry and 20 percent for recreation.

The majority favored state government operating nonpoint source control programs for road building, recreation, farm and ranch activities. Most said local government should take that role in construction and urban areas.

Professor studies prairie dogs and ecosystem

CALDWELL (AP) — The results of research done by an Albertson College of Idaho professor indicate rodents are a reliable measurement of how healthy prairie ecosystems are.

Biology professor Eric Yensen says the conservation of more popular animals depends on the preservation of the smaller, less visible rodent community.

"What's good for Idaho ground squirrels is also good for elk," Yensen said. "They both like the same habitat. When you create habitat for ground squirrels you also create habitat for elk."

Yensen said the same is true for grazing cows, which are documented to favor range lands inhabited by prairie dogs.

Although most of the state's ground squirrels are still abundant, the northern Idaho ground squirrel has become rare. Its numbers have been reduced by changing habitats caused by fire suppression and the invasion of annual grasses.

Daughter of victim questions inspection

By David Lee
Times-News writer

BURLEY – The daughter of a Burley woman who suffered carbon monoxide poisoning this weekend blames a local fire official for failing to find the problem in an inspection.

But the official said he wasn't asked to check for carbon monoxide – and wasn't given key information that would have prompted such a test.

"I was called in to inspect a natural gas and propane leak," said Burley Assistant Fire Chief Dick Randklev. "That's what their concern was at the time. I looked at the furnace and water heater, and they appeared to be running normal."

While Randklev inspected the trailer home at 1581 Hillcrest Lane B2.

Saturday, Martha Chavez was in bed, having returned from a visit to Cassia Regional Medical Center for her headaches, said daughter Cathy Eckley.

Randklev left and on Monday Chavez felt worse. Eckley said Chavez returned to Cassia Regional, then was driven by ambulance to Twin Falls and flown by air ambulance to St. Luke's Regional Medical Center in Boise.

Chavez remained there in critical condition Wednesday after suffering a carbon monoxide-induced heart attack, Eckley said. Gail Marquez, who also lives at the house, was treated and released. Eckley does not live in the house.

Gas company officials tested the air in the house on Monday and told Eckley the carbon monoxide level was unsafe, she said. Randklev should have tested for it while he was there, she said.

Randklev said he would have done more at the house if Eckley had given him more information.

"They didn't let me know they were ill," he said. "She said the mom was at the doctor, but I didn't know why."

Randklev said he did not ask why Chavez was sick, because he wanted to respect her privacy. If someone had told him Chavez was sick from the air, he would have done more testing and, if necessary, would have evacuated the house.

Randklev said he was there about five minutes, and the carbon monoxide probably was not strong enough to affect him. Chavez and Marquez, who had been in the house most of the weekend, did not pass out from the fumes even though they felt sick.

"We didn't want them hurt, and we do feel bad that we missed that (carbon monoxide). How do you know what's behind Door No. 3?" Randklev said.

The experience will change how he handles similar situations in the future, he said.

"I would ask more questions next time," he said.

afford to refuse on checking identifications because that person getting coffee might be an undercover agent, she said.

Tobacco sellers must know that the person buying tobacco is at least 18 years old. That means mandatory identification from anyone who looks younger than 27 unless the seller knows the person is old enough, she said.

In addition to stiffer penalties, the law made tobacco less accessible to minors – and adults – by requiring stores to keep tobacco products where customers can't get them without asking.

Many gas stations and convenience stores keep cigarettes behind the counter, while grocery stores and markets often lock them up.

Some retailers feel caught between regulations and customer service.

"We want to obey the laws, but we also have to keep our business going," said Sue Anne Jones, a manager at Costco Wholesale.

Costco keeps its tobacco in a locked cage to comply with the law, a move that has irritated some customers, she said.

The stricter identification requirements might anger some customers, but Rita Ruffing of Corner Merc in Castleford won't give in, she said.

"All we can say is, 'It's the law,'" she said.

Times-News staff writer Brian Haynes can be reached at 733-0931, Ext. 238.

Can I see some ID?

Tobacco sellers are adjusting to a new state law that limits access to tobacco and stiffens penalties for selling tobacco to minors.

If you're looking to buy a pack of smokes and you look younger than 27, be ready to show identification.

Here are some other parts of the law:

- All tobacco products must be kept behind the counter or in a place accessible only by employees.
- Minors trying to buy tobacco or adults buying tobacco for minors can be fined $300 and spend six months in jail.
- Employees caught selling tobacco to minors can be fined $100 by the state. If convicted on criminal charges they can face six months in jail and a $300 fine. Employers can be fined by state and federal authorities these amounts:

Sundance Film Festival pays homage to indie nut

By Jami Bernard
New York Daily News

PARK CITY, Utah — A documentary can only be as good as its subject, and Chris Smith has found a doozie in "American Movie," which premiered here at the Sundance Film Festival.

Smith tracked aspiring filmmaker Mark Borchardt, a manic, debt-ridden, one-man disaster area who longed to make a horror movie.

Making a movie costs money, and between child-support payments, back taxes and a running tab at the liquor store, Borchardt, a cemetery attendant, didn't have any. So he set about finishing a horror short he had begun three years earlier (whose title he repeatedly mispronounces). His thinking was that if he could sell just 3,000 video cassettes of "Coven" (pronounced any way you please), he could finance his other project.

Obstacles mean nothing to Borchardt. When neighborhood pals fail to show up to act as extras, he interrupts his mother's grocery shopping, stuffs her into a ninja robe and marches her through the frigid Wisconsin woods. His cast includes a sweetly loyal best friend who partied a little too hard back in the old days, and now can hardly nail up a flyer, let alone memorize a line.

Director Smith said that Borchardt had been a film student of his, and that he had seen him in the neighborhood shooting a scene. "It was a train wreck," says Smith, referring not to the subject of Borchardt's movie but to the general air of nuttiness that hangs on the guy like a ninja suit with a stuck zipper.

"It was always chaotic with Mark, things were falling apart all around him. But he has a lot more passion than lots of film makers I've met."

Aside from the wacky depiction of indie film making at its loneliest and most quixotic, the beauty of "American Movie" is that Borchardt's indomitable and even unreasonable will to finish his movie is a metaphor for his fight to transcend the horror show that is his daily life. The dream keeps him alive.

"Coven" had its own midnight screening on Monday. Borchardt and his pals (all of whom functioned as prop masters, location scouts and mud-drenched extras) nervously welcomed the receptive crowd to the Egyptian Theater on Main Street.

"This movie was done with a CP16 camera in one hand and a Pabst Blue Ribbon in the other!", proclaimed Borchardt to audience cheers.

"Coven" turns out to be about the horrors of inner demons (like writer's block) and outer ones (conformist 12-step programs). It shows that Borchardt, while strange, has an eye for composition.

The film is quite underexposed in places. Since Borchardt played the star and victim of the 12-steppers, he had someone else work the camera. "I said, 'Dude, ya gotta open that lens up! Dude!'," Borchardt recalled.

Parents believe missing U of I student is likely dead

LEWISTON (AP) — Keith Hendrick has been a police officer for 32 years, and his professional experience has left him convinced his missing son William is likely dead.

It's been more than two weeks since the University of Idaho student disappeared. Family, friends and police have few clues as to his fate.

"You know all the signs, and the signs aren't good," said Hendrick, who worked as a police officer in Coeur d'Alene, Kootenai County and for the Coeur d'Alene Tribe before becoming police chief in Lapwai for 12 years.

His son disappeared after leaving a Moscow back-to-school party intoxicated on Jan. 10. His car was found the following day parked haphazardly in a downtown lot with the keys in the center console.

The popular drama major was last seen by a resident of the apartment complex where Hendrick had been at a party with fellow theater students. The resident told police the confused 25-year-old stumbled into his apartment by accident that night, but left after learning of his mistake.

Police don't suspect foul play.

EPA issues cleanup order against wood company, city

SAINT MARIES (AP) — The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has issued a unilateral administrative order against Carney Wood Products, Ltd., and the city, to address creosote contamination that is threatening the St. Joe River.

Creosote contains cancer-causing chemicals and the agency considers it a hazardous waste. It is used to treat wood, making it rot- and insect-resistant.

"Our initial investigation has indicated there's a substantial plume of creosote polluting the river," said Chris Field, manager of the agency's Emergency Response Unit in Seattle. "We need to move fast to take advantage of the seasonal low water in the St. Joe."

The administrative order is a legal tool that enables the EPA to require immediate cleanup action by the responsible parties. If the parties involved do not respond to the order, the agency can do the cleanup work itself and recover its costs later. Both Carney Wood Products and the city have indicated a willingness to resolve the matter, according to the EPA.

In addition to its popular recreational uses, the St. Joe is home to threatened and endangered species such as the bull cutthroat trout and the bald eagle.

Killer bees move into southern Nevada

CARSON CITY (AP) — Killer bees have taken up residence in southern Nevada and won't be leaving anytime soon, the state's agriculture chief told lawmakers Wednesday.

"We didn't think the bees would be here this soon, they moved too fast — over 100 miles from Arizona," Nevada Division of Agriculture chief Paul Iverson said.

"There are 44 different swarms we've captured and eradicated, but there are many, many, many more swarms," he added. "Even if they all die off this year, they will be back next year."

"In Las Vegas we have an unusual situation because of tourism and the many nice mini-environments for the bees with the casinos," Iverson said, referring to decorative ponds and other sources of water around the resorts.

The division is charged with tracking the bees' progress and telling people how they can keep themselves safe from the swarms. The job is assigned to one full-time staffer.

Legislature

the House Judiciary, Rules and Administration Committee voted to print the bill.

Its next step will be a House committee for an open hearing.

- After a failed attempt by prisoners in a Bannock County jail to assassinate guards and escape, using the guards' own manual as a guide, the Idaho Sheriff's Association wants to keep secret the documented ins and outs of operations.

Sen. Cecil Ingram, R-Boise, said he did not want jail policies, which could affect prisoner human rights, to be undisclosed. The idea's supporters agreed and are reworking the proposal to exempt only security operations manuals from the public-records law.

- Telemarketers are getting a one-two punch in the Statehouse this week.

Wednesday, the Senate State Affairs committee unanimously voted to print a bill that would allow Idaho residents to prohibit telephone solicitors from calling them.

Being pushed by Attorney General Alan Lance, the bill would create a list Idahoans could pay the state to get on. Telemarketers would have to buy the list, and it would be a crime to make an unsolicited phone call to sell something to anyone on the list.

If that weren't enough, Rep. David Callister, R-Boise, is scheduled to propose an idea today that would forbid telemarketers from blocking "Caller ID."

Schools

Faculty identified strategies to boost student skills in those areas, he said, and set goals such as having 80 percent of the student body score in the 80th percentile on the upcoming Direct Math Assessment.

Reading skills are a major focus at Robert Stuart, Ainsworth said. A goal was set three years ago to improve student scores by 12 points annually. Curriculum strategies have been targeted to work toward that goal, so far successful only in the ninth grade.

Reading scores remain a district-wide concern, Superintendent Terrell Donicht said, and continue to be analyzed.

Principals from both schools said all teachers have been or are receiving safety-crisis manuals for their classrooms.

Clemens highlighted the decline in expulsions seen at Robert Stuart over the past two years. In the past six school years, they dropped from a high of 31 in 1995-96, to seven last year and only one so far this year.

The principals explained how technology is being used in their schools and said teachers are rising to the challenge of incorporating it in classrooms.

Kimberly proceeds toward annexation

By Margaret Jones
Times-News correspondent

KIMBERLY – Kimberly will proceed with the annexation process for properties adjacent to the city limits that receive city services, the City Council decided Tuesday.

City engineer Scott Bybee designated the properties that would be considered. The next step in the process will be informing the property owners, advertising it and bringing the matter before the planning and zoning board.

Bybee also suggested the council set up a user- and impact-fee schedule in the event a large business comes into Kimberly. He said this is something businesses expect when they enter a community, and the city should have an equitable schedule ready.

In other Kimberly city business:

- Lee McKinley, library commissioner, reported Richard Luff had volunteered to paint the bookshelves in the library. New carpet also will be added.
- The council voted to pay $20,287.86 to Central Idaho Construction for work done on the Oak Street sewer line.
- It denied a request from the Southern Idaho Regional Communications Center to trade a simplex radio frequency for the city's duplex frequency.
- It voted to add another computer to the administrative office equipment.

Guinn schedules summit on nuke waste

The Times-News
and The Associated Press

CARSON CITY, Nev. – With less than a month of governing under his belt, Gov. Kenny Guinn has joined the fight against federal plans to dump high-level nuclear waste in Nevada.

The governor set Feb. 16 for a "State Summit on Nuclear Waste" with state and congressional leaders at the Nevada Capitol.

"He recognizes this is the top issue in the state, and he wants to gather as much information as he can in order to devise the most effective plan as possible for the state," spokesman Jack Finn said Tuesday.

Some waste destined for Nevada would come from Idaho.

The meeting will focus on developing strategies to derail federal efforts that would require Nevada to accept the nation's high-level nuclear waste.

Idaho Republican Sen. Larry Craig has been leading the drive to set up a temporary dump at the Nevada Test Site while work continues on determining whether a permanent dump should be built at Yucca Mountain, the only site under consideration for storing the nation's highly radioactive commercial waste.

"As Nevada's newly elected governor, one of the first challenges that I will be confronted with will be fighting the federal government's illogical bias to send deadly nuclear waste to our great state," Guinn said. "This is clearly the most devastating environmental and economical problem that Nevada's citizens will face."

The waste site proposed at Yucca Mountain would house some of the highly-radioactive waste now stored at the Idaho National Engineering and Environmental Laboratory. In an agreement with the state, the federal government has until 2035 to move the water out of Idaho.

The Senate last year passed Craig's legislation under the threat of a presidential veto, and the Senate majority was short of the two-thirds needed to override. Then-House Speaker Newt Gingrich agreed to a request by former Nevada Rep. Republican John Ensign, and did not bring the nuclear waste bill up for a vote.

As Guinn maps out a state strategy, members of the congressional delegation are working in Washington to stop legislative attempts to set up a Nevada dump.

Idaho lawmakers send reserve fund plan to governor

Associated Press

BOISE — The House gave Republican Gov. Dirk Kempthorne the first legislative victory of his term, agreeing to set aside the initial $32 million in payments to Idaho from the tobacco industry settlement.

The Senate-passed bill was sent to Kempthorne for his signature Wednesday on a 54-13 vote. Critics argued the state's immediate spending needs are too great to bank so much cash.

"The purpose is not just to park this money there temporarily," Democratic Rep. Ken Robison of Boise said. "The purpose is to increase the balance in the reserve."

Republican Reps. Hod Pomeroy of Boise and Tom Trail of Moscow joined all 11 House Democrats in opposing the legislation to deposit all the money the state expects to get by mid-2000 from the tobacco industry in the Budget Stabilization Fund.

Democratic Floor Leader Wendy Jaquet of Kenan said Idaho should follow the lead of other states and at least create a dedicated trust fund in which to deposit the money while beginning a debate over how to use it. Interest from the existing reserve account goes to the Permanent Building Fund to finance state construction projects.

Dirk Kempthorne

Wendy Jaquet

But supporters of the governor's position reminded lawmakers the Legislature will still be able to draw from the reserve fund next year — including the tobacco money — on a simple majority vote.

"The fact is there is a thousand different ways that we could spend that money today. The fact is, we don't have it today," Geddes said. "We'll spend it in when we get it. We'll spend it in an appropriate place."

The infusion would increase the fund to $68 million.

Kempthorne proposed saving the tobacco money in an apparent attempt to convince legislators to keep $16 million in existing state revenue out of the reserve fund.

A law passed last year requires automatically setting aside 1 percent of the state's $1.6 billion general fund budget if revenue growth is 4 percent or greater. But the governor's spending blueprint for the year that starts July 1 depends on having that cash available.

Appropriations Chairman Bob Geddes of Preston denied the intention of the tobacco money legislation was to bolster the rainy day account. He said it simply would be unwise to allocate cash the state has not yet received.

Doctors warn of lost funding for rural care

BOISE (AP) — Legislative budget writers have been warned that health care in rural Idaho will be even harder to come by if they fail to step in and cover revenue losses of special residency programs.

Drs. Todd Swanson and Jonathan Cree told the Joint Finance-Appropriations Committee on Wednesday that their Family Practice Residency programs in Boise and Pocatello are losing $340,000 combined this year because of federal cuts in Medicaid and Medicare reimbursements.

Those payments for care for the elderly and poor account for up to three-quarters of the programs' annual revenue.

The residency programs help convince young doctors to practice in Idaho and especially in rural communities that have, for years, been unable to attract doctors.

Republican Rep. JoAn Wood of Rigby decried the lack of care in her central Idaho districts where towns like Challis, Mackay, Dubois, Terreton and Salmon are without doctors.

"We've got the health clinics, but we don't have the physicians," she said.

Cree, who runs the Pocatello residency program, said if the state does not cover the lost federal revenue, the program doctors would have to curtail care for those unable to pay and stints in rural communities that have no resident physicians.

Gov. Dirk Kempthorne did not include in his proposed budget the extra $300,000 the program is seeking to offset the revenue reduction. Faced with severe cash restrictions and priorities in other areas, administration analysts have emphasized again and again that there was not enough money to cover all requests.

Group wants Marine inquiry in horse shootings

RENO, Nev. (AP) — Animal rights activists want the U.S. Marine Corps to launch its own prosecution of two Marines accused of slaughtering 34 wild horses with high-powered rifles in Nevada.

"The crimes are reprehensible because of their sheer savagery," said Priscilla Feral, president of Friends of Animals, in a letter to the Marine Corps commandant. "There should be no place for such malicious cruelty in the United States Marine Corps."

The two Marines and a high-school friend face up to 15 years in prison if convicted in civilian court of theft, larceny and killing another person's animal. They were arrested earlier this month in the Dec. 27 slayings just east of Reno.

Friends of Animals, a group based in Darien, Conn., that helped raise a $35,000 reward for the killers' capture, wants the Marines prosecuted under the Uniform Code of Military Justice as well, and drummed out of the Corps if convicted.

"The Marine Corps is esteemed for its extremely high degree of discipline," Feral said in a letter this week to Gen. C.C. Krulak. "If the inquiry finds evidence that the two Marines were indeed involved in the massacre, they should be prosecuted by Court Martial."

Krulak had no immediate response at Marine Corps headquarters in Quantico, Va. But a Corps official at Camp Pendleton, Calif., said Wednesday there were no immediate plans for an independent inquiry.

"Until the investigation is complete on that end, it would be premature to talk about anything that might occur on this end," Staff Sgt. Lesli Cuilley said from Camp Pendleton, where one of the Marines is based.

Lance Cpl. Scott Brendle, 21, based at Camp Pendleton, and Lance Cpl. Darren Brock, 20, based at Twenty Nine Palms, went to high school in Reno with the third suspect, Anthony Merlino, 20, a Reno construction worker.

Merlino was arraigned Jan. 15 and is free on $65,000 bond.

Brock was being held Wednesday at the San Diego County Jail and Brendle at the Mammoth Basin Jail in San Bernardino, each in lieu of $65,000 bail. Both remain on active duty.

Brock and Brendle have waived extradition and are expected back in Nevada for their arraignments Monday in Virginia City. Storey County District Attorney Janet Reed said she's confident neither will be allowed to return to their bases until the civilian investigation is complete.

Hawaii lures Japan market

Tourism agency uses Sumo wrestler in campaign

HONOLULU (AP) — The Aloha State is banking on a quarter-ton sumo wrestler floating in a huge inner tube and singing "Blue Hawaii" to revive its faltering tourism industry.

Konishiki will have to make a big splash, since fewer tourists visited Hawaii last year than the year before, the first decline in five years. Preliminary state estimates said Hawaii received 6.8 million visitors in 1997, a 1.6 percent drop from 1996.

The primary cause was a 10 percent decline in Japanese visitors because of that country's economic crisis. Japan represents a quarter of Hawaii's tourism industry.

To reverse that decline, the Hawaii Visitors & Convention Bureau this week began a multimedia campaign in Japan featuring the retired Konishiki, or Salevaa Atisanoe, an Oahu native who competed at 640 pounds before retiring last year.

The "Big Relax, Big Hawaii" ads are part of the bureau's 1999 marketing plan for Hawaii's $11 billion tourism industry, which generates about a quarter of the state's tax revenue and a third of its jobs.

As the campaign begins, the stakes are high for the agency and the state.

Under a law passed last year, HVCB now has to compete with other agencies for tens of millions of dollars in state tourism promotion funds.

And the state has been mired in an economic malaise since the Gulf War in 1990.

"There are 16 million Japanese that travel. They love Hawaii, they know a lot about Hawaii, they want to come to Hawaii," HVCB president Tony Vericella said Tuesday. "We will be doing a whole lot more to make sure we have a bigger, more visual and fully integrated presence in Japan."

The agency expects Japan's economy to stabilize this year, once government reforms take effect. The agency's marketing budget for Japan will triple this year to $10.4 million.

Much of that is being spent on Konishiki, whose girth will grace television commercials, railway station billboards and magazine and newspaper advertisements. Some of the ads feature him in a bathing suit on the beach.

"We think in the near future and beyond we will see a better set of results from Japan," said Vericella, who estimated this year's arrivals could swing 3 percent in either direction.

Last year, the state nearly doubled its budget for tourism marketing to $555 million. Of that, HVCB will get $47 million, a 56 percent increase from last year.

The bureau hopes the extra money will increase visitor arrivals by almost 2 percent to 6.9 million, make tourists stay longer and spend 4.4 percent more, or $11.2 billion. The agency predicts those gains will cause a $2.5 percent increase in state tax revenues.

Vericella said the plan also aims to build new markets that complement the main markets of Japan and the West Coast. The key ingredient is balance between leisure and business travelers, first-time visitors and returning vacationers and those who travel during peak and off-peak periods.

Hawaiian-born retired sumo wrestler Salevaa Fuaefi Atisanoe, widely known as Konishiki, sits in his room working on the Internet between bouts of the Grand Sumo Tournament in Nagoya, Japan, in this July 1997 file photo. On Tuesday, the Hawaii Visitors and Convention Bureau said it was launching a multimedia campaign in Japan featuring Konishiki.

Senate preserves logging rules

BOISE (AP) — The state Senate has turned its back on a former member and voted to preserve minimum safety standards for the logging industry.

Without a dissenting voice on Wednesday, the Senate rejected an attempt by Industrial Commission Chairman Rachel Gilbert to repeal those standards in favor of less comprehensive federal standards.

No member defended the position espoused by Gilbert, who served three terms in the Senate before a failed 1990 gubernatorial bid and an unsuccessful 1992 congressional run.

The House must still concur.

Sen. Shawn Keogh, R-Sandpoint, said any problems with existing state rules can be worked out without eliminating all the state standards.

"This is a hugely important lifesaving program for loggers in Idaho," she said.

Gilbert, an outspoken conservative, said the three-member commission was concerned about state liability under the standards and believed that it could be eliminated by repealing the rules. She maintained that the logging safety program could be run successfully under guidelines and recommendations rather than rules and enforcement action.

Commission member Jim Kerns, former Idaho AFL-CIO president, opposed Gilbert's proposal.

WEST IN BRIEF

Senate will debate smoking in restaurants

BOISE — A Senate committee has introduced legislation requiring restaurants to seat smokers in separate rooms.

"I've been going into too many smoky places," said Myran Schlechte, the retired Legislative Services director who wrote the new bill. "It just reached the breaking point."

The proposal being considered by the Commerce and Human Resources Committee would require public places to fully enclose smoking sections or get rid of them altogether.

Sen. John Andreason, R-Boise, concedes the bill he is sponsoring will be controversial and the outcome remains unclear.

Idaho Hospitality and Travel Association Director Jennifer Lindsey warned that the requirement would be a financial burden to Idaho restaurants, many having already installed state-of-the-art ventilation systems.

"Having to wall off an entire room or entire area of the restaurant would be very costly," Lindsey said.

Some 20 percent of Idaho adults smoke regularly, matching the national average.

Contract dispute means higher med costs

IDAHO FALLS — Federal workers in eastern Idaho who use a popular health insurance plan will have to pay more if they use the region's largest hospital.

Blue Cross of Idaho moved Columbia Eastern Idaho Regional Medical Center off its list of preferred hospitals Jan. 1, when the two sides failed to agree on a new contract. As a result, people using Blue Cross' federal employee plan will have to pay an extra $250 each time they are admitted to the hospital, said Rich Wright, spokesman for Blue Cross of Idaho.

"If (CEIRMC) decides to sign the contract, then they would move back onto the list," Wright said.

Ron Butler, the hospital's chief executive officer, condemned the action, saying it amounts to using federal workers as a bargaining chip.

"It's unfortunate that a business would use their clients to leverage good faith negotiations," he said.

Former employee faces burglary charges

POCATELLO — A former Idaho State Journal employee is one of two people facing felony charges for their alleged involvement in trashing the newspaper's offices.

Louis K. Horvath, 25, and Dustin Ramsey, 28, were served with summons charging them with burglarizing and vandalizing the Journal in the early morning hours of Dec. 19.

Horvath worked as a mail room employee at the paper from 1994 to 1996.

His former supervisor said he remembered Horvath being upset when he left because he wanted more money, but he had not been fired.

"I'm glad this wasn't a vendetta against the paper as initially expected," said Stephanie Pressly, Journal publisher. "However due to the extent of the damage, I still expect restitution."

Current damage estimates exceed $11,000.

Lewiston area records more crime in 1998

LEWISTON — The most recent statistics for city and county auto accidents, traffic violations and general crime showed mixed results for 1998.

While the total number of auto accidents dropped 2 percent from 1997, the number of accidents resulting in injury fell 22 percent.

Capt. Paul Ayers attributes the drop to the department's recent emphasis on traffic safety.

"I think (the new figures) reflects an increased use of seat belts and drivers becoming more aware of their driving habits," Ayers said.

The county recorded a dramatic increase in the number of people arrested for drunken driving, however. The county made 112 arrests in 1998, a 58 percent increase from 1997.

Meridian mulls buying farmland for public

MERIDIAN — A federal program could help cities buy farms and operate them for public education.

Earlier this month, Vice President Al Gore announced a $1 billion initiative to help local governments protect green space and reduce auto traffic.

Mayor Bob Corrie is exploring whether the money could help with farm preservation. "We've been thinking about having a working farm, and we're looking for some land," Corrie said. "Farms are a part of Meridian's heritage."

Corrie envisions the farm at around 25 acres, preferably as close to the middle of the city as possible. Like a city park or plaza, its main function would be for enjoyment, education and cultural preservation.

Aviators strive to keep open access to remote airstrips

BOISE (AP) — Commercial pilots have threaded their way through sheer river canyons to dirt airstrips in Idaho's primitive back country since before World War II.

But these same intrepid aviators who ferry food, mail and sportsmen to and from those remote areas are dodging flak from conservationists who contend the small, fixed-wing aircraft are noisy, intrusive and landing in numbers far beyond what land managers envisioned.

Not surprisingly, the pilots see themselves in quite a different light.

"If it wasn't for planes in the mid-'20s and '30s and '40s, we would have had roads all through there. It's because of the airstrips that the wilderness has remained the way it is," said Bob Danner of Stanley Air Taxi.

There are more than 50 airstrips in and around the Frank Church-River of No Return Wilderness. The legislation creating it in 1980 prevented the Forest Service from unilaterally shutting down the existing runways.

But, said Boyd Miller, a McCall pilot and president of the Idaho Aviation Association, "they can put such restrictions on them that would reduce the use and that's what we're fighting."

Forest Service officials are discussing possible strictures, such as limiting some fields to emergency landings only.

Wilderness Watch, a national conservation group based in Missoula, Mont., has waged a campaign against human development in America's wild lands, including permanent outfitter camps and fixed climber bolts drilled into mountain faces.

The group claims the number of flights in the Frank Church has increased in the last two decades to the point they are degrading wilderness values. Beyond commercial or government flights, there are private pilots who like to "bag a strip" for bragging rights among their fellow flyers.

Last September, U.S. Rep. Helen Chenoweth convened her House forest subcommittee on flights into the Frank Church, taking testimony from pilots and disabled residents who feared sightseeing junkets would be halted.

Spokesman Chad Hyslop said the Republican lawmaker was concerned the Forest Service could disrupt longtime flying services and undermine maintenance of the crude runways.

"One of her baseline concerns about flight over government land is that a land management agency doesn't become involved in directing air space," Hyslop said. "Those agencies have to respect the guiding statutes of that particular area."

Federal Aviation Administration spokesman Mitch Bucher said his agency is only involved in how planes using these strips mesh with other air traffic, or if the landing area has received FAA dollars.

George Nickas, executive director of Wilderness Watch, sees the involvement of Chenoweth and others as part of an "attempt by Congress to undo the Wilderness Act. It will go for a while unless there's a change of attitude in Congress or when the environmental community takes them on."

Chenoweth flew into some of the runways in 1998, noting that while the Forest Service is talking about removing traces of man, it still maintains buildings with indoor plumbing, refrigerators and other trappings at some of the fields.

Visitors to the heart of Idaho rely on the Cessnas, Otters and Beechcraft to get them there. Danner said half his flights are scenic trips. The rest involve ferrying in recreationists and dropping off supplies.

"We have a number of outfitters who have their own planes and the industry is dependent on access for float and hunting outfitters," said Grant Simonds, executive director of the Idaho Outfitters and Guides Association. He said he does not expect any big changes in Forest Service policy.

In the Hells Canyon National Recreation Area, where environmentalists and jet boat enthusiasts have battled for years over access to the continent's deepest gorge, the Forest Service is considering proposed regulations that could limit overflights.

The conservation plan was developed by the National Wildlife Federation, The Wilderness Society, the Hells Canyon Preservation Council and several Native American tribes.

It would ban the creation of new airstrips and limit use of existing strips to emergencies, fire fighting and wildlife monitoring.

It also would prohibit proliferation of sightseeing and outfitter flights into the canyon to head off the kind of aviation gridlock the Grand Canyon has experienced.

Miller and Danner are concerned because when weather is bad over the high peaks of central Idaho, the only north-south route for small planes from Lewiston to Boise can be through the canyon.

Miller said pilots leave a very light footprint in the wilderness as they introduce many people to its marvels.

"We try our best to be aware of the other users," he said. "I have flown in and been the only person on the river. A bunch of rafters came by and I had no solitude whatsoever."

DEALING WITH ALZHEIMER'S

Rita Hayworth's daughter talks about caring for her mother

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) — She's a princess, but of course even royalty and riches can't solve everything. So, like anyone caring for a loved one with Alzheimer's disease, Princess Yasmin Aga Khan found out how exhausting the disease can be.

This is the bond the princess shares with other Alzheimer's caregivers, and a reason, she says, that she continues to be a spokeswoman for the national Alzheimer's Association 12 years after her mother's death.

Princess Yasmin's mother, actress Rita Hayworth, died in 1987, six years after being diagnosed with Alzheimer's. The princess, whose father Prince Aly Khan was Hayworth's third husband, moved her mother to New York in 1981 so she could help care for her.

Princess Yasmin, who now lives in Park City, also is a spokeswoman for the Utah chapter of the Alzheimer's Association. The group will hold its annual gala, "An Evening to Remember," Friday evening at the Little America Hotel Grand Ballroom.

When Hayworth was first diagnosed, Princess Yasmin had never heard of Alzheimer's. This was before the disease had become the subplot in made-for-TV movies or the subject of magazine features. In fact, it was publicity about Hayworth that suddenly raised awareness about Alzheimer's.

After the diagnosis, Princess Yasmin was contacted by what she calls a "mom-and-pop" support group in New York, whose members began to help her realize that, although there is no cure, there are ways to help manage the disease and ways to survive it as a care-giver.

Unlike many caregivers, the princess could afford to hire a full-time nurse when her mother needed around-the-clock care. Still, she became drained, she says, from worrying all the time about her mother's condition.

Known during the 1940s as the Love Goddess, Hayworth became not only forgetful but increasingly frightened and paranoid as her disease progressed. Eventually, the princess says, she had to soundproof her mother's room.

Princess Yasmin Aga Khan, in Salt Lake City Monday, is active in the Alzheimer's Association. She argues caring for a loved one with Alzheimer's disease. Princess Yasmin found out how exhausting the disease can be.

Known during the 1940s as the Love Goddess, Hayworth became not only forgetful but increasingly frightened and paranoid as her disease progressed. Eventually, the princess says, she had to soundproof her mother's room.

Her mother's decline was especially difficult because of their relationship. "I was very close to her," she says. The most distressing moment came shortly after the diagnosis, when she and her mother were looking in a mirror together.

"Who are you?" Hayworth asked.

Like other Alzheimer's patients, Hayworth eventually forgot even how to swallow. Princess Yasmin called in a priest to administer last rites, but Hayworth continued to live, and deteriorate, for three more years.

To honor Alzheimer's caregivers, the Utah chapter of the Alzheimer's Association has created an annual award. This year's honoree is former Salt Lake Neil Papiano, who helped care for his mother for 15 years before her death in 1998.

Papiano, who graduated from South High in 1952, is now an attorney in California, where his clients include Elizabeth Taylor, Joan Collins, Cary Grant and Ed McMahon. Papiano has established a scholarship in his mother's name at the University of Utah.

"An Evening to Remember" begins at 6 p.m. with a social hour. The evening also includes music by the Sax Machine and both a live and silent auction. Proceeds from the gala are used to support Alzheimer's research and for statewide programs serving the 25,000 Utah patients of the disease and their caregivers.

For more information about the gala or Alzheimer's disease, contact the association at 596-6308 or 1-800-371-6694.

Spurt of storms should stoke water supply for California

FRESNO, Calif. (AP) — California's southern Central Valley should be spared serious crop damage by the freaky storm that cloaked some regions with snow for the first time in 25 years.

And actually, the winter splash is just the type of weather that bodes well for farmers who had been warned they might only get half their 1999 water supply after an unusually long dry spell in the Sierra Nevada.

Monday's mix of snow, slush and rain was the latest in a spurt of deluges to shower the mountains and surrounding foothills, with Tulare and Kern counties the hardest hit.

Bob Chilton, supervising manager for the Tulare County Agricultural Commissioner's Office, said Tuesday that damage was limited to some minor limb breakage, mainly in olive trees.

Unlike last month's citrus freeze, there were no dangerously bitter temperatures accompanying this storm, which Chilton characterized as "more-of-a-visual event than it is an actual catastrophic event."

"It was just nice and pretty, and there's no sign of it today, except an occasional snowman," he said. "In the grand scheme of things, the damage is minimal."

More important, meteorologists and water gatekeepers say, is that such storms continue so that there will be enough water to slake the agricultural thirst in the heart of California farm country.

"We went a whole month with no sip of precipitation," said Jeffrey McCracken, spokesman for the U.S. Reclamation Bureau. "We were below normal. But we're cashing up."

An unusual four weeks of bone-dry weather in the Sierra Nevada from mid-December to mid-January left alarmingly low snowpack readings. A few areas in the southern Sierras reported no snow as recently as a week ago, said Frank Gehrke, chief of snow surveys for the state Department of Water Resources.

"Up until the past week, it was not looking all that good," Gehrke said.

Basing its projections on those early readings, the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation had gloomily projected Friday that farmers north and south of the Sacramento-San Joaquin Delta might get only 50 percent of their 1999 water supplies.

In a dry year, the bureau must give fish and wildlife first crack at any water banked in reservoirs, as stipulated under the federal government's 1992 Central Valley Project Improvement Act. That leaves the water allocations to farmers more heavily dependent on annual precipitation.

"We pretty much live year-to-year now," said Dave Kranz, a spokesman for the California Farm Bureau Federation, the state's largest farming lobby.

But the spate of storms that began Jan. 16 have been pushing readings towards and even past normal levels, indicating farmers are more likely to get the water they need during the coming growing season.

For instance, in the northern Sierras, where run-off is critical to water supplies, January's index was pushed to 9.4 inches in 12 days, climbing to 104 percent of the normal monthly reading.

Tax-exempt farm annoys Montana county commissioners

GERALDINE, Mont. (AP) — Glen Fuller enjoys luxuries most grain farmers couldn't dream of.

He doesn't need to carry crop insurance and his farm thrives even when prices are low. Better yet, when he prays for rain it comes — well, at least some of the time, he says.

Fuller is thankful. But some folks in Geraldine have become resentful of the 3,400-acre grain operation he runs since they learned last month that it will no longer pay property taxes — costing Chouteau County about $18,897 a year.

Fuller manages the farm just north of Geraldine for The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Last month the Department of Revenue decided the church farm — with an appraised value of $1.2 million — qualifies as a tax-exempt operation.

Gene Walborn of the Department of Revenue said the decision is clear-cut. The farm has nonprofit status from the federal government and grows grain to feed needy families.

County Commissioner Ken Engellant said it's not right. And he fears other religious groups will follow suit.

"If they want to be do-gooders that's fine. ... But it's not fair to the local people who also give to various causes and pay taxes," Engellant said. "We're subsidizing them."

"If they want to be do-gooders that's fine. ... But it's not fair to the local people who also give to various causes and pay taxes."

– Chouteau County Commissioner Ken Engellant

Former Chouteau County Commissioner John Wirt, now a state representative, and Rep. Ray Peck, D-Havre, say they may introduce a bill to eliminate or revise a subsection of the tax code regarding nonprofit farms.

"What is saying many other churches or Hutterite colonies couldn't change their structures somewhat and fit right under this umbrella also?" Wirt asked. "That's where I think counties should be really nervous."

A rush on applications for tax-free status is not likely, according to Walborn, whose department handled the decision.

Hutterite colonies already have undergone tax status reviews and the Department of Revenue has classified only their church buildings, parsonages and schools as tax-free.

And there aren't many organizations out there similar to the LDS Geraldine Welfare Farm. The LDS church owns two other agricultural properties in Montana — a 12,000-acre farm in Conrad and a 40,000- to 50,000-acre ranch near Harlowton — but both are commercial.

Yet county commissioners are insulted by the way the tax decision was handled as they are concerned about the effects.

They learned about the decision to take the church off the tax rolls second hand after the Revenue Department sent the county assessor's office a letter announcing the decision.

"It's darn maddening on our part," Engellant said. "It affects us a great deal."

The welfare farm paid nearly $19,000 in taxes to Chouteau County in 1997. That was less than 1 percent of the county's tax revenue, but worrisome nevertheless, Engellant said.

"We don't have any animosity toward the LDS church itself," Engellant said. "We're just so hamstrung that to lose anything is tough for us."

Tax initiative I-105 holds property taxes to 1986-87 tax levels, Engellant said.

Walborn said the Department of Revenue could have been more sensitive about informing the county of the tax loss.

"No doubt about it, it's a big impact for the county. We could have done a better job communicating," he said. Most (tax-exempt decisions) aren't as big as this. It went through our normal procedure and when it hit it was a big shock to everybody."

Tax-exemption decisions are based on established law and the state is not required to inform local officials or hold public hearings. There is also no appeal process.

The decision on the Geraldine Welfare Farm was based on existing tax code. The church simply applied for tax-exempt status.

"Even if we had a public hearing I'm not sure what we could have done if the community said no," Walborn said. The welfare farm met the state's tax-exempt requirements. Period.

Dogs talk, so Field listens and learns

I've heard all the jokes about talking dogs, but I'd never seen a real one until Field Woodland and I went chukar hunting a few weeks back.

Field has a plump little short-hair that he calls Bub. It's not much of a name, but she's one tough dog when it's time to hunt.

Bub makes a lot of noises. I always passed them off as just dog sounds, but Field insists she's talking.

Of course I've teased him and asked, "What's she saying now?"

Field always has some reply, like, "She's saying hurry up. Let's get there." Or, "Steak sandwich – two maybe three days old."

"Yeah, right," I've always thought. "She's not talking. You're just guessing."

I've had a lot of fun at his expense, but I have to confess, he's pretty good at interpreting Dog – assuming Dog is a language.

DOG-EARED TALES
Bill Studebaker

Field even has a theory about this. He says that Dog isn't well understood because people are domineering and tell their dogs to shut up. Even worse, people drone on and on, so the dogs never get a word in edgewise.

If people would let their dogs talk, they would learn to understood Dog.

But you know people.

Though he understands Dog, Field isn't too impressed with barking. Same thing with howling, which Field refers to as singing.

Anyway, he and Bub and I were hunting a likely spot for chukars on the last day of the season. We parked the truck and prepared to make a swing up a little draw, then over a ridge, down another draw and back to the pickup.

Our plan was logical. It minimized the climbing and it was efficient with our time. We wouldn't be walking too far and we'd get back in the truck before dark.

With this scheme in mind, Field let Bub out of the truck and said, "OK, go find some birds!"

She ran pell-mell through the tall grass along the creek, then zig-zagged up the rocky hillside. Her route veered right, which was unfortunate, because our plan was to go left. So Field gave a toot on his whistle.

Ol' Bub turned and came running. Man, she was running hard. With every stride, her hind legs reached almost to her nose.

What's more, she yipped as she ran.

It wasn't a howl, or a bark, or a yelp, or a whine. It wasn't a whimper, or a growl, or a yowl, or even a warble. It was a definite yip.

She made contact with Field, then looped off again to the right. Field tooted once more and Bub stopped. She looked at us and kept yipping.

Field tooted again and Bub came a-running. She never even slowed when she reached us. Nope, she just turned and went back to the right.

Little soprano yips virtually exploded from her lungs. Even a non-Dog speaker such as myself could tell that something was up.

I looked at Field. He shrugged, then said, "She's saying the birds are right over there. Be ready. She says they're right there."

He pointed toward Bub, who had locked up in a stylish point. We took her word for where the birds were.

Sure enough, we found them.

Our guns barked out a greeting and several birds fell to earth. I got a double, but try as we might, we couldn't find both of them. Later, after we gave up looking, Bub just wouldn't quit.

She nuzzled Field's hand and gave a low warble.

"Really?" he said. "Then show me."

With that, Bub turned back to the business of looking for the lost bird.

"She says it's here," Field explained, "but it'll take her a couple more minutes to find."

Sure enough, Bub found it deep among the big boulders. It must have been 40 feet from where I thought it went down.

She brought it to Field, who handed it to me. I stroked the warm, soft little bird for a moment before tucking it into my jacket.

"Dog language," I thought to myself. "What have I been missing all these years?"

LOVE IS IN THE AIR

Wild animals have more on their minds than food right now

By Stu Murrell
Times-News correspondent

In winter, most folks think wild animals are just hanging on for survival.

Actually, a number of species have already started their reproduction cycle. The timing may seem a little odd, but the idea is to synchronize the birth of their young with the arrival of ample food in early spring.

The horned owl is a classic example.

Horned owls breed in late January, timing the birth of owlets to coincide with the increase in rodent populations in spring. As a rule, plenty of rodents means plump owlets.

As one of Idaho's largest raptors (birds of prey), horned owls are among the earliest nesters. They do not build nests of their own, preferring instead to commandeer old magpie or crow nests. They have also been known to nest in rocky aeries in southern Idaho's canyons.

The laying of one to four eggs is a slow process for horned owls, and their incubation can take up to 35 days. As with all raptors, maturation of the young is exceedingly slow. Nestlings leave the nest after eight to 10 weeks.

By this time, it's usually April or May – which is when rodent populations are in full bloom.

Horned owls also feed avidly on magpies and crows during the long months of winter when owls need food to fuel their reproduction drive. This is one reason why magpies and crows will harass horned owls during daylight hours when the owl is vulnerable. Payback time!

The coyote is another creature whose breeding season begins in January to coincide with the arrival of ample food in spring. Song dogs, as they're sometimes called, can be seen running in pairs and their moonlight serenades increase as nupcial activities proceed. On still nights, people living near the Snake River Canyon often hear the coyotes' song at this time of year.

STU MURRELL/The Times-News

Top, horned owls are breeding at this time of year, timing the arrival of their young with blossoming rodent populations in the spring.

At left, like owls, coyotes also breed in January so there will be plenty of food available for pups in the spring.

Below, black bears, like this one in its brown phase, do their breeding in June – but development of the fertilized egg is delayed until the onset of winter.

Coyote pups are born about two months after the female is bred. Thus, most coyotes are born in April. Pups leave the den after about two months and hunt with the parents most of the summer.

Coyotes are extremely opportunistic, so they'll eat almost anything – from fruits, to nuts, to all types of live prey. With flexible tarding habits, coyotes rarely go hungry in spring and early summer.

Red foxes have roughly the same breeding cycle as coyotes.

They have learned to live in close proximity to humans, so their dens are scattered throughout the farmland of the Magic Valley. Because of their nocturnal habits, they are not as easily seen as coyotes. However, during late spring and early summer, adult foxes are forced to hunt during daylight hours.

If you think you've seen one, but aren't sure, listen for their distinctive, coughing bark.

Red foxes sometimes do amazing things. Some have been observed standing on their hind legs with forepaws pressed on their mate. The ensuing dance is quite comical to watch.

Black bears have a different approach to timing the birth of their young. Sows are bred in June, but the eggs have a delayed implantation until winter sets in. Cubs are born in late January or early February.

By late spring, black bear cubs are ready to leave the den. By that time, the world is a-bloom with lush foliage for the mama bear to eat.

Sawtooth Ski Club works toward purchasing grooming equipment

The Times-News

STANLEY – The Sawtooth Ski Club needs comments, letters of support and donations toward a $10,000 proposal to groom cross-country ski trails at Stanley City Park, Alturas Lake and Park Creek.

The trails, located in the Sawtooth National Recreation Area, would be groomed using two new "Heavy-duty Workhorse" snow machines purchased through a matching grant from the National Trails Recreation Funds (administered by the Idaho Department of Parks and Recreation), private donations and ski-club funds.

The ski club's fund-raising goal of $10,000 would cover purchase and ongoing maintenance of the snow groomers, plus start-up costs and operations. If the grant is awarded, the ski club would purchase the two snow machines, one set of ski-trail grooming implements and a trailer for transporting them to allow grooming on a weekly basis.

The Alturas Lake and Park Creek trails are known for their outstanding views, terrain and snow conditions. With additional grooming, cross-country skiing and ski skating could be enhanced at all three sites, according to a news release distributed by the ski club.

Season and day passes would be required for anyone using the trails. Currently, donations of $2 per person are suggested at all trails with the exception of Stanley City Park.

So far, grooming quality has been limited by the lack of good machinery and grooming implements. The National Trails grant would help the ski club improve its trail-grooming program in the Sawtooth Valley and Stanley Basin area.

Club members say that better grooming would lure more skiers, which would be a boon to local business. Making more trails skiable could also reduce conflicts between motorized and non-motorized winter recreation, the news release said.

The Sawtooth Ski Club was formed in 1992 to promote cross-country skiing in the Sawtooth Valley.

Since its inception, the Sawtooth Ski Club has worked to establish 18 kilometers of ski trails at Park Creek, 12 kilometers of trails at Alturas Lake and 2 kilometers of trails at the Stanley City Park.

For more information, contact Julie Meissner at (208) 774-226, or write to the Sawtooth Ski Club, P.O. Box 224, Stanley, ID 83278. Meissner also can be reached by e-mail at julie@sawtoothguides.com.

Rescuers race to save anglers on thawing ice

The Associated Press

SALT LAKE CITY — When Draper's Dan Eliason arrived at Yuba Reservoir at 10:30 a.m. Saturday, he didn't like what he saw.

The ice near shore looked unsafe and two dozen angler were out on stronger ice in the middle of the lake, unaware of deteriorating conditions close to shore.

A 20-yard swath around the perimeter of the lake cracked and shifted. A 35-mph south wind had come up and was blasting the ice with warm air. Eliason saw sleds and buckets blowing across the ice.

A man broke through the ice near the shore, waist deep, and crawled out. The people on the ice shifted nervously from the middle toward the cracking shoreline.

A man with a dog sled made a running start and careened across the dangerous shore area, now a melting, cracking moat. He struggled to safety.

Eliason thought of calling a ranger, but decided there was no time. Fifteen miles of dirt road lay between the reservoir and the ranger station.

Park Manager Pat Jerome said rangers usually patrol the lake to make sure it is safe for ice fishers, but in this case conditions changed quickly.

It was up to those on hand to attempt a rescue.

"There were three of us there that figured, 'We have got to get these people off fast,'" Eliason said.

The group was now stranded on cracking ice above water 20 feet deep.

"You might have five or 10 minutes in water that temperature. The only way they could be rescued is with a boat," he said. "And there was no boat.

"This one guy had a blue plastic sled, maybe 2 by 5 (feet), so we threw him the rope and he tied it on," said Eliason. "The sides of the sled were 3 inches high. No way it would float if it stopped."

It would be women and children first. The two children were pulled to safety across cracking ice that would still support the sled if it was pulled quickly.

The rescuers realized the turnaround time was too slow. They tied the sled to the middle of a long rope so it could be pulled back and forth across the chan-

Thinner perhaps than when they started, but in very good spirits, members of the IceTrek Expedition to the South Pole (from left) Peter Phillips, Jon Muir and Peter Hillary adjust their sleds on a cargo pallet for the trip back to New Zealand Tuesday. The team was flown back from the South Pole earlier Tuesday, having reached the Pole earlier in the day, after 84 days of travel across snow and ice, dragging all their equipment behind them on sleds. The team had hoped to make an unsupported round-trip journey to the South Pole and back, repeating the ill-fated journey of Robert F. Scott in 1911, but decided to abort the return leg to the ocean as they had been badly delayed due to terrible weather and a bout of food poisoning. Despite their travails, the team was optimistic. 'It was an excellent trip,' said an upbeat Hillary.

C.W. Hog trekkers take on Kilimanjaro

POCATELLO (AP) — For some members of the Cooperative Wilderness Handicapped Outdoor Group, trekking into Mount Everest base camp last May was simply a prelude to their next adventure: climbing Mount Kilimanjaro this fall.

Twelve trekkers, including five disabled, hiked to the base camp at 17,600 feet in Nepal to cheer on C.W. HOG founder Tom Whittaker, who became the first mountaineer with a disability to climb Everest. Whittaker's right foot was amputated in 1979 after a car accident.

After reaching Everest's 29,028-foot-high summit on May 27, Whittaker decided he wanted to climb the highest summits on seven continents.

Mount Kilimanjaro in eastern Africa is 19,340 feet high.

"After being so beat up and busy after Everest, he decided on Kilimanjaro because it's not so demanding," said Jeff Brandt, C.W. HOG director at Idaho State University.

Some C.W. HOG members also wanted to do a peak they could summit instead of going into a base camp. Kilimanjaro has several routes to the top.

"He wants to do one that involves some climbing and rappelling," Brandt said.

Judge bars teen poachers from hunting after scheme

SODA SPRINGS (AP) — Four Caribou County teen-agers have been fined thousands of dollars and barred from hunting, fishing and other licensed activities for up to nine years for poaching a dozen buck deer and a bull moose since mid-December.

"They were doing it to sell the horns," Fish and Game Conservation Officer Larry Hlavaty said. "I've never handled a case this flagrant."

Three of the bucks were rated as trophy size. The four boys were arrested after a 10-day investigation that began earlier this month and pleaded guilty this week in Caribou County Magistrate Court.

"Whitney Bolton, 18, and Rick Hill, 18, were each fined $5,000, ordered jailed for 14 days and barred from hunting and fishing for nine years. Jayson Erickson, 16, was fined $1,800 and banned from hunting and fishing for five years. And Shane Davis, 15, was fined $1,000 and banned from hunting and fishing for four years.

All four are from Soda Springs.

"That's a lot of dollars to be paying at this age," Magistrate Ronald Hart told the four during a two-hour hearing at which each pleaded guilty and was sentenced.

"There goes a year of college," Hart said. "You shot 12 deer and a moose and wasted the meat and left it to rot. As a result you have to pay the consequences."

Hlavaty pointed out that the last Legislature boosted the penalties for poaching trophy game and that one of the teens could have been fined as much as $39,000.

Hart said they were not charged with more serious offenses possible under the new law because of their cooperation with authorities.

In addition to the fines, the four have to pay combined court costs of nearly $1,000.

Handcrafted traditional snowshoes elegantly blend form, function

KILA, Mont. (AP) — The snowshoes Ron Amos creates by hand from Canadian ashwood and rawhide are designed with a very select, discriminating customer in mind.

"My clientele has a traditional mentality," says Amos. "Exclusively, the people I get are the people who will buy a cedar-strip canoe, or a handmade custom saddle. Most of my clients come from back East.

"Most of my business is done on the Internet, with 90 percent of the orders from Wisconsin, Minnesota, Michigan and the New England states. That's where they have lots of snowshoe races. And it's also where most people still have that traditional mentality."

Not uncommonly, he says, people will buy a pair of his snowshoes for no other reason than to hang them over their fireplace for decoration.

It's easy to see why.

Amos' Great Bear Enterprises snowshoes are an artful blend of form and function. The graceful curves of the ash frames, and the intricate patterns of the rawhide lacing, are set off with a warm luster by a finishing coat of marine varnish.

But Amos bristles at the suggestion that traditional snowshoes are suitable only as wall hangers, that they're uncomfortable, and that their performance is vastly inferior to the new high-tech designs that have proliferated with the recent popularity of the sport of snowshoeing.

"The makers of high-tech snowshoes have pushed this thought process onto the public," he says. "I'm not taking this lying down. They're being deceptive in their ads, and that bothers me, because it hurts the reputation of the traditional snowshoe.

Ron Amos begins the rawhide weave across an ashwood frame while constructing a pair of handmade snowshoes in his home near Kila, Mont., recently.

"I guess it's subjective, but I know mine perform as well, and I think mine perform better than the new high-tech ones. The high-tech ones are made for shallow snow. None of them are over 10 inches wide. They won't support a man of your (over 200 pounds) size. I make mine up to 14 inches wide. You have to make them to fit an individual's size and weight."

Another advantage of traditional snowshoes over most new models, says Amos, is their ability to "vent" snow that has a tendency to pile up on top of the shoe as a person walks.

"Most of the high-tech ones have a solid piece of plastic for flotation," he says. "Light weight is supposed to be their mainstay. But the snow has no place to vent. So you end up carrying it on top of the shoe. Then it no longer weighs 2 pounds; it weighs 6 pounds."

The design of the traditional rawhide-laced, wood-frame snowshoe can be traced back at least 6,000 years, according to Amos.

"It goes back to the migration over the Bering Strait from Russia to Alaska," he says. "That's the earliest record of them being used. They (people) were following the migrating herds for a food source. So they developed snowshoes out of necessity. All Indian tribes had their own style.

"It took 6,000 years to develop these. They must have learned something along the way."

Amos offers five styles of snowshoe, each designed to provide top performance for a specific use and terrain.

Unique to Amos' traditional snowshoes is an ashwood cleat that he mounts in the bottom of the shoe to help provide traction on crusted snow when climbing.

All five models have the same price tag — $249. He also makes miniature snowshoes as decorations, for $35.

The price Amos charges doesn't reflect the amount of painstaking labor he puts into his snowshoes. Each pair represents about two weeks of work.

"People are getting a good deal from me right now, to be honest," he says. "I'm trying to make a name for myself. I think it's working. I'm pleased with where I'm at in my third season of working at this full time."

While working construction in Alaska in 1982, Amos made his first pair of snowshoes from a kit.

"I got so interested in it," he says, "I started to seek out more information about it over the years. I thought it might be something I'd like to do. Whether it was something I could make a living at was another question."

Although he read books about making traditional snowshoes, he says he had to learn the actual techniques through a lengthy process of trial and error.

"I use a traditional style of lacing that goes back years and years," he says. "I didn't have anybody to show me how, so it was a hit-and-miss process to learn how. I finally figured out the process to bend the frame. It was a major process. It took me a year and a half to get it down so I wasn't breaking every pair."

His lacing technique is his trademark, Amos says.

"What I do that's unique," he says, "is to double-twist the edging. That strengthens the weakest part of a snowshoe where the laces attach to the frame. I also have more individual loops connected to the frame.

"Plus, I put more lacing in the center section, and tail section, than the others. That's what sets mine apart from the few other people who are doing this. There's maybe one or two more people back East, who are trying to make a living like I'm doing."

Elaborately weaving 100 feet of rawhide strips into each pair of snowshoes, it takes Amos an average of six hours to complete the lacing.

Each pair of snowshoes is made to order for a particular customer and is signed and numbered.

"The crux of snowshoe-making is fitting them to someone, individually," Amos says.

Amos uses a unique lacing technique that sets his snowshoes apart. The graceful curves of the ash frames and the intricate patterns of the rawhide lacing are set off with a warm luster of marine varnish finish.

nel, then added another rope to the sled's front so it could be pulled more quickly.

Jennifer Guelker, who was fishing with her boyfriend, Dave Thompson, recalls the melting ice sheet sinking under their weight. One by one, the anglers crossed through open water cracks and bobbing chunks of ice. In 30 minutes, all but two were pulled to safety with no more than wet legs.

But the ice where the last two anglers stood started to break up, and the last ice between them and shore melted and blew away.

"It was eerie. You could feel it drop, and this floating feeling, and then you're standing there on this 20-foot iceberg ... separate from the other people," said Thompson, second to last off the ice. He got in the sled and skimmed across the slush as rescuers pulled on the ropes as fast as they could.

"There was just enough crushed ice to buoy you. I thought, 'I hope the ice lasts for the last guy.'"

It didn't.

There was no ice remaining when the last man's turn came. Five people grabbed the ropes, turned and sprinted away from the lake. The stranded man shot across the water. He arrived on shore a bit wet but safe.

Should hunting cougars, bears be banned?

Opinions are divided on initiative

OLYMPIA, Wash. (AP) — Randy Sage was upstairs when he heard his dog yelp. When he arrived downstairs, he found his dog's head in the jaws of a cougar. He beat the big cat off with a slipper and watched it saunter away.

"It was not afraid," he said. "It was going from home to home to have a meal."

Sage, of Republic, is one of several activists who told lawmakers recently they supported a bill that would overturn a voter-approved initiative banning the use of bait or hounds in hunting bear and cougar.

House Bill 1012, sponsored primarily by Rep. Bob Sump, R-Republic, would reinstate the use of dogs and bait, both of which were banned by voters in 1996 with Initiative 655.

Four similar Senate bills — 5068, 5133, 5001 and 5120 — would leave the initiative intact except for the use of hounds in cougar hunting.

The House Natural Resources Committee took no action on the controversial bill. Substantial revisions will be required, said Co-Chairwoman Debbie Regala, D-Tacoma.

Sage's story was one of many offered as proof that wild animal populations are booming statewide and that the bill is needed to protect public safety.

But for every argument offered in support of the bill, firm rebuttals were not far behind.

Advocates of effectively repealing I-655 contend that using hounds will cause cougars to fear humans and avoid human habitats.

Rocky D. Spencer, a Washington fish and wildlife biologist, examines a 130-pound male cougar that killed a number of animals at Northwest Trek, a wildlife park near Eatonville, Wash. In this May 1998 file photo. Voters who supported a ban on the use of hounds in hunting cougars three years ago probably did not foresee the consequences of allowing the wild animal population to grow unchecked. The number of cougar complaints statewide has more than doubled, from 247 in 1995 to 563 in 1997.

But Dr. Rob Wielgus, a brown bear researcher who participated in the hearing by telephone from Washington State University, said that was not necessarily true, as cougars are solitary carnivores.

"No hunted cougar (is) going to learn to avoid human beings, because it would be dead," he said. "And it's not going to transmit that knowledge to anybody else."

Contentions that I-655 was responsible for booming wild animal populations were rebutted with assertions that cougar and bear populations have been steadily rising in Washington since the mid- to late-80s.

That's due as much to a good feeding environment left when loggers remove timber as to reduced hunting pressure, said Steve Pozzanghera, who oversees management of bears and cougars at the state Department of Fish and Wildlife.

Cougar complaints have risen from 247 in 1995 to 927 in 1998, and black bear complaints have risen from 208 to 786 in the same period, according to the department's statistics.

Only two human fatalities have been reported in Washington: one by a cougar in 1924 and one by a black bear in 1974, Pozzanghera said after the hearing.

State growth and housing developments encroaching on rural areas can explain some of those complaints, said a spokesman for the animal welfare group PAWS.

"Of eight counties reporting the highest cougar sightings, four are in the high-growth Interstate 5 corridor," Will Anderson said.

Cougar and black bear harvests have dropped — cougars from 283 in 1995 to 132 in 1997, and black bears from 1,218 to 844, the department said.

The key question — whether there was any correlation between numbers of complaints and I-655 — was not answered.

"We've been asked repeatedly about the levels of correlation between ... complaints and Initiative 655," Pozzanghera said. "As a trained scientist and biologist, I can tell you we are unable to correlate or quantify (the two)."

But the ability of the department to manage bear and cougar populations has been affected by the initiative, he said.

By way of remedy, he proposed a "surgical" approach that would depend on designated hound or bait quotas or permits in focused geographic areas.

Other tools to complement that approach would be selective hunting seasons, additional staff and resources for the department, and better public education programs.

Less cost-effective and less traditional methods like sterilization, capture and removal of the animals — an approach used with wolves in Alaska — also were worth considering, he said.

BIG CAT COUNTRY

New habitat is not typical private zoo

DUNLAP, Calif. (AP) — The southern Sierra foothills that stairstep their way to Kings Canyon National Park are classic California big-cat country: sparsely populated by humans and with huge expanses of habitat for rodents, rabbits and deer.

It is a place where mountain lions prowl and bobcats abound.

To those who own property in these parts, the sounds of feline predator meeting prey is as much a part of the nighttime wilderness symphony as a coyote's howl.

Dale Anderson is one such landowner. His rural spread covers 100 acres along State Route 180, about 15 miles west of the national park entrance.

There are two bobcats, he says, that patrol his property at night. He doesn't worry, though, that they will bother his particular herd of livestock. More likely, the wild critters would turn tail if they peered into one of those cages out back and found themselves eye-to-eye with Anderson's pair of Bengal tigers.

Anderson, a former commercial airline pilot, is proprietor of one of California's newest and most specialized zoos.

The Sierra Endangered Cat Haven, which opened in May, is home to those two tigers, three of only 270 of the world's Amur leopards, a pair of caracals, three other subspecies of leopards, and one caged native bobcat.

It is, yes, a zoo — open every day save Easter, Thanksgiving and Christmas; admission price $5.75 for adults and $3.25 for children.

But it is a zoo that is more means than end — a place designed to make a profit to support its owners, but established to be a focal point to educate visitors to the plight of the world's endangered big cats, and to motivate them to do something.

"All I really want to do," said Anderson, "is to save cats. But you have to do all this other stuff to make that work."

The sincerity of that sentiment is gaining recognition in the fraternity of big-cat conservationists.

Darla Hillard, conservation education director for the International Snow Leopard Trust, said that while such small private zoos have become relatively common, Cat Haven stands out because of its focus on big cats and its clear commitment to species preservation.

"They are different from many traditional zoos in that their nonprofit arm works not to support them, but to support conservation efforts in the host countries of their cats," she said. "This is a group of young, energetic people who project commitment and passion for doing what they can for the conservation of one specific group of endangered predators."

The nonprofit group, called Project Survival, is even more singularly focused. Its goal: to stabilize the habitat and populations of big cats, principally jaguars, in South America before their demise becomes as pronounced as that of the tiger.

Anderson is in the midst of a six-week research trip to Brazil that is prelude to a major effort to protect the jaguar — a species not yet endangered, but whose habitat is shrinking.

"Project Survival," said director of education Julie Abraham, "makes Cat Haven meaningful — because if all we do is keep cats in cages, it's a fabulous headache for no purpose."

The task of starting and maintaining a zoo for exotic felines in a remote location 45 miles from the nearest population center — Fresno — has been a headache of migraine dimension.

Anderson, 38, said the project's origins were in a junior high classroom when he was a youngster in Santa Rosa and a visiting naturalist brought to his class "a mountain lion named Sam."

Rompola buck score remains unconfirmed

By Eric Sharp
Knight Ridder News Service

TRAVERSE CITY, Mich. — Mitch Rompola's announcement that his whitetail buck had been measured as a world record re-ignited the controversy over his apparent feat, mostly because of the secrecy surrounding the scoring.

Rompola had a friend post an announcement Sunday on the Internet that the buck's antlers had been measured by four Boone & Crockett-certified scorers. The rack had a gross score of 223 and a net score of 218 5/8, which would be five inches bigger than the existing world-record whitetail killed by Milo Hanson in Saskatchewan in 1993.

But Rompola, who said he killed the deer with a bow Nov. 13, did not reveal the names of the scorers. He could not be reached for comment Tuesday, nor had he notified Commemorative Bucks of Michigan, which records most trophy animals killed in the state, or Boone & Crockett, the Missoula, Mont.-based organization that must sanction the deer as the world record.

Rick Hamm, who posted the notice on the Internet for Rompola, said, "Mitch asked me not to speak to the press anymore. I think he probably just needs a break from all the publicity. I'm just his friend, and my phone is ringing off the hook. Imagine what it must be like for him."

Stan Banker, president of Commemorative Bucks, said most trophies are scored at the group's annual Deer Spectacular in Lansing, which is Feb. 12-14 this year. He said as many as 40 certified scorers are on hand to measure the animals and get them into the record book.

Banker said the group's by-laws call for potential state-record animals to be scored by a three-judge panel selected by the organization. He said the group probably would accept Rompola's score if the measurers he selected also were well-known B&C scorers. "But we'd have to get the scoresheet in our hands physically before we accept anything."

Chris Tonkonsin, assistant to the director of big-game records for Boone & Crockett, said the group had had no contact with Rompola and "the club has no formal comment at this time."

However, she said the usual procedure for people who kill a trophy deer (antlers that score over 160) is for the hunter to have it scored locally by a B&C measurer and submit the scoresheets to Missoula along with the $25 record entry fee.

A deer that scored 218 5/8 probably would be listed immediately as the potential world record, pending a second measuring at a panel-scoring event. The next time that will be done is in 2001, at a site yet to be chosen.

Tonkonsin said that at the panel-scoring, the top 10 examples of various game animals killed over the previous three years are remeasured by two groups of two scorers each, who arbitrate differences in their scores.

Traveling the world, all its seas

Couple leads a champagne life on a beer budget sailing the globe

VENTURA, Calif. (AP) — If it hadn't been for illegal gambling, Lin and Larry Pardey would not have met. And an amazing seafaring life story would have gone untold.

It was a circuitous route that led to their fateful meeting.

More than three decades ago, Lin, then a student at San Fernando Valley State College (later, it became California State University, Northridge) was playing bridge for money in the cafeteria. One of the game's losers reported her to school officials and she was asked to leave the campus permanently, dashing her dreams of becoming a civil engineer — an unlikely career, anyway, for a woman in the mid-1960s.

"Interestingly," Lin said, "I was a misfit at college. I really was a very good student, but I didn't know why I was there. When I got caught gambling, I thought, well, the decision's been made for me."

She settled into the business world as a corporate accountant, where a serendipitous photograph happened to be above her desk. It was a picture of a schooner, and the sight of it beckoned her to revisit the art of sailing — something her parents had introduced to her as a child.

She learned that the boat in the picture was owned by a client of the company for which she worked — and that he had a small sailboat for sale. Co-workers encouraged her to call the captain, and soon she drove 150 miles to Newport Beach to discuss the prospect of purchasing the boat.

As it turned out, the captain took a shine to Lin, and he talked her into going out with him.

Enter Larry.

"On the way to dinner, we stopped at a waterfront dive and Larry was there playing pool," Lin said.

The next day, Larry, then a charter skipper, managed to meet Lin at the docks before the smitten captain arrived, ostensibly to offer his own sailing expertise — and to talk her out of buying the sailboat.

What started as a childhood dream for Lin became a lifelong partnership with Larry Pardey, a former sawmill worker from Canada. With his rugged good looks and aquamarine eyes, Lin fell for him quickly.

Larry equally was enamored of Lin, a petite dynamo with a mane of luxurious black hair.

Lin, who'd come from a conservative background, with its world of regular jobs and few vacation days, was intrigued by Larry's idea that they could work for awhile, then take time off to sail to Mexico.

The plan was to return home after five or six months and do it all over again two years later. In the boat they built together, the 24-foot Seraffyn — made of mahogany and oak, with solid teak decks — they soon found they could make their living at sea, eschewing any sort of conventional job and going, instead, on an endless vacation.

Rather than return to the corporate world, they would take on such tasks as revarnishing other people's boats or doing minor repair work or even returning the boats of wealthy owners after a regatta. For this, they would tuck the Seraffyn in a safe place, deliver someone else's boat to its home port for a fee, then return to the Seraffyn with enough money for supplies and more adventure.

"We settled for a very simple lifestyle," Lin said, "but we had the whole world."

Together, in 30-plus years, the Pardeys have visited 66 countries and logged tens of thousands of miles across nearly every large body of water in the world.

They call Norway home, but they are visiting the states, where this month they are leading seminars on all they have learned about sailing and the world and all they have written on the subject. And they have learned and written a lot.

In their travels, the Pardeys have been welcomed by people of all cultures and economic circumstances — mostly, they say, because their boat attracts all kinds with its more welcoming, less intimidating size.

"We've been a guest at the governor's palace in Gibraltar, and we've been guests at a fisherman's shack in Mexico," Lin said.

The Mexican fishermen were stunned when they couldn't see a motor on the Pardeys' boat, Larry said. They became convinced it was because the Pardeys were too poor to purchase one and generously invited them back to their village to share food.

"In fact, one of them said later, 'You're not Americans — you're not tall and you're not rich!' " Larry said, laughing.

After crossing the globe in their 11 years aboard the Seraffyn, they built their Lyle Hess-designed 29-foot cutter, the Taleisin, named for a Welsh troubadour. Larry, with his logging background, even took on the job of cutting down the black locust trees for the new boat's wood frame.

At a spot 2,400 feet up on a mountain at Lake Elsinore, the pair built the boat during the worst rainstorms of the 1980s. Some 600 homes were damaged, the roads washed away, and their neighbors dubbed Larry — who'd steadfastly continued his boat-building — "Noah."

During their travels, the Pardeys discovered they had much to share, and so began a writing career that took shape when they disagreed with an article in a magazine that claimed one needed a big boat for serious sailing.

"There are a lot more people with small boats," Larry said, "so we had the majority of the market."

This newfound talent led to 10 books, four videos and numerous articles in international sailing magazines.

"We have epic narratives we did on our 11-year trip around the world," said Larry, who stresses craft above sophistication of equipment for successful sailing. "Lately, we've mostly written technical books."

Their most recent work, "Cost Conscious Cruiser," subtitled "Champagne Cruising on a Beer Budget," expresses their philosophy about the joy and ease of sailing inexpensively.

"What's happened in our sailing world is that everyone is told you have to have the biggest, the most expensive, the best," Lin said. "We're saying you have to have skill, and you have to have the dream — and you don't have to have very much money."

They call Norway home, but they are visiting the United States, where this month they are leading seminars on all they have learned about sailing and the world. In their travels the Pardeys have been welcomed by people of all cultures and economic circumstances.

Women at work, watch your back

Survey says 75% of women have been sabotaged by another woman

By Raymond McCaffrey
The Gazette

Linda Tripp and Tonya Harding might go down in history as feminism's worst nightmare.

Their devious deed: They sabotaged another woman — Monica Lewinsky in Tripp's case and Nancy Kerrigan in Harding's. They set a sister up, knocked her down, stabbed her in the back and left her writhing on the floor, while they walked away without a second thought.

It's despicable, it's catty — and it's all too common," says Judith Briles, author of the new book "Woman to Woman 2000," which explores woman-on-woman sabotage in the workplace.

According to Briles, more than 75 percent of women in one survey she conducted said they had been "undermined" by another woman in the workplace.

Some common sabotage tactics: somebody taking credit for your work, failing to give you important messages, betraying confidences, passing on false information about you.

"It can be as simple as plain old-fashioned gossip, which is one of the easiest ways to destroy one's career," says Briles, who lives in the Denver area.

Why are so many sabotaging their fellow women? Briles believes one reason is fear: Since women are usually lower on the corporate ladder than men, they feel more threatened in the workplace. They tend to strike out more at other women because they're more likely to have power over them, Briles says.

"It's also really important to stress that this is not an exclusive female issue," Briles says. "This goes on with men, too, but there are differences. Men are usually more overt, blatant. Women are more likely to deliver sabotage in

Tips for finding out if you're the subject of sabotage

Here's Judith Briles' checklist to determine if you're the victim of workplace sabotage:

- Has anyone ever passed on or exchanged information about you that was untrue?
- Has anyone ever taken credit for work you had completed?
- Has someone ever volunteered to be a reference but later gave a neutral or negative assessment?
- Has someone ever threatened you with a "consequence" if you did not support most or all of their demands that you felt were contrary to your values?
- Has anyone ever forgotten to give you important messages/memos that later caused problems for you with your superiors?
- Has anyone ever expected you to be, react or work in a specific way without telling you what that way was?
- Has anyone ever committed to do something with you or support your plans, then reneged on that commitment?
- Has anyone ever called or planned a meeting that involved your ideas or plans but did not include you in the meeting?
- Has anyone ever tried to reduce or destroy your credibility?
- Has anyone ever told another personal information that you had shared confidentially with them?

The incredible numbers of modern business

NEW YORK — Do you get the feeling of late that the way the dollar bill is passed around doesn't make much sense, at least when measured by the standards in vogue when you were growing up?

Be assured you aren't alone. And no, not all the events that bring on your sense of incredibility emanate from Washington. They surround you; they are hard to believe, but real, and you don't have to define "real."

Kevin Garnett, a 1995 high school grad, gets a six-year, $100 million-plus contract from the NBA's Minnesota Timberwolves. Jayson Williams of the New Jersey Nets recently signed for $100 million over seven years.

These are dollars matched by no other sport, industry or, with the exception of law, any profession. And they're paid to individuals for bouncing a ball and tossing it through a hoop.

Which, some cynics and sports fans might be inclined to say, is money better spent than paying lawyers several times that to negotiate with tobacco companies. Minnesota's legal bill for that was $440 million.

Consider this: Bankers Trust agreed to pay employee bonuses of $1.1 billion for 1998, or 20 percent of gross revenues. No way to measure that as a percentage of profits. It didn't have any; it lost $6 million.

Well, in today's weird world, maybe profit isn't necessary in determining value. In mid-January, Amazon.com's shares were priced 55 times more than when the company went public. It has never made a profit.

Dow slides 124; S&P, Nasdaq also tumble

Bridge News

ST. LOUIS — U.S. stocks staged a broad retreat as an afternoon rally attempt failed and Brazil's currency woes kept traders jittery. The Dow Jones industrial average closed down 124.35, or 1.33 percent, at 9200.23. The Nasdaq tumbled 26.09, or 1.07 percent, to 2407.32 in a late-day slide.

The S&P 500 index fell 9.12, or 0.73 percent, to close at 1243.19.

Volume on the NYSE was 888 million shares as declines topped advances 1,942 to 1,055 and 539 were unchanged. On the Nasdaq, volume was 1.026 billion shares, with 2,042 shares lower vs. 1,247 shares higher.

Small stocks also posted losses, with the Russell 2000 index off 4.21, or 0.99 percent, to 421.12.

Oil, paper, airlines and bank stocks led declining sectors, while Internet, biotechnology and drug stocks paced gainers.

"Once investors saw the afternoon rally would fail, stocks resumed their sell-off," said Allen Shoaf, a Nasdaq trader with NatCity Investments.

The market continued to suffer from weak breadth, analysts said. But despite the negative advance-decline ratio and a high percentage of bullish sentiment among investment managers, "which is sending alarm signals," the market is not rolling over, said Scott Bleier, chief investment strategist at Prime Charter Ltd.

"Money is ferociously chasing technology issues, so the bell ringing isn't bringing down the market," Bleier said. "Nobody knows what's going to derail it."

But other analysts saw Wednesday's fall as only a pause.

"We'll see new highs soon," predicted Charles Blood, director of financial markets at Brown Brothers Harriman. "There's a tremendous amount of money growth and in money coming into the technology leaders."

Trial to focus on Microsoft's software development cost

WASHINGTON (AP) — For all the perilous questions the government threw at ex-Microsoft senior executive on the witness stand of his company's antitrust trial, he never got to answer the one he seemed most eager to tackle.

How much money has Microsoft spent developing its Internet browser software, which it declared in December 1995 will be "forever free?"

The figure, which has been hinted at but never publicly disclosed, is important for the government, which alleges that Microsoft invested enormous resources developing its browser but decided to give it away free to consumers to undermine Netscape Communications Corp., which made popular rival software.

The government maintains that Microsoft's financial sacrifice illustrates what it describes as illegal, predatory behavior toward Netscape.

Microsoft's Paul Maritz surprised the government's lead lawyer, David Boies, by offering Tuesday to volunteer "some rough figures," Maritz said they included "salaries of both full-time and temporary employees, any money that we paid outside firms who work under contract for us, capital equipment and the corporate overhead in terms of buildings and facilities."

"I could give you a general ballpark figure," offered Maritz, the highest-ranking Microsoft executive expected to testify at the trial.

But Boies clearly didn't want to hear Maritz's answer — yet. He challenged Maritz over how the company arrived at its estimate. And he noted that Maritz answered "not to my knowledge" when asked during his deposition last April whether Microsoft kept track of how much it spent developing its browser.

Finally, still avoiding the figure Maritz offered, Boies pressed the executive to hand over to the government whatever financial documents the company had used for its estimates.

"We will come back to this subject," Boies promised Tuesday.

"Like the wind, you can feel it ... It's present and here, but you're just not sure where it originated."

Briles' theory could be considered heresy in feminist circles. After all, wasn't the women's movement all about empowering a sisterhood ready to take its rightful place in what had long been a man's world?

Well, certainly that sisterhood does exist. Witness organizations like the Colorado Springs, Colo., nonprofit Women's Resource Agency, which, for roughly a quarter of a century, has been helping women enter the workplace through workshops and one-on-one counseling.

"I've worked in a women's organization for a long time and we've always worked as a team," says Betty Osgood, a counselor at the agency.

However, Osgood and Briles appear to be on the same page on at least one count. Osgood sees a lot of the same insecurity in women that Briles does.

"A lot of women seem to lack confidence," Osgood says. "It's very scary for women to enter the world of work especially if they've been homemakers for a while. Their focus has been on their family."

Loraynne LoCascio, a Colorado Springs real estate appraiser, has run into a different kind of woman in the workplace.

"I'd work with a guy any day," LoCascio says. "There's something about the female gender. What I have found is if you work very hard and do very well, women try to drag you down. I have found rather than try to work together ... they work against each other."

In mid-January, America Online's shares sold at about 200 times what analysts expect its 1999 earnings might be. Its price-to-earnings ratio could go higher too, judging from analysts' recommendations.

Even without more buying, AOL's market value was greater than the entire Standard & Poor's publishing group, including McGraw-Hill Cos., Dow Jones & Co., Times Mirror Co., Gannett Co., Knight Ridder, Tribune Co. and The New York Times Co.

While such incomes and valuations hardly concern today's rabid sports fans and investors, they are held in awe by millions who find it impossible to place them in context.

You can understand why when you look at the U.S. savings rate, which dipped below zero late last year. People not only spent all their take-home pay but borrowed too. Athletes, meanwhile, gave the banks money to lend.

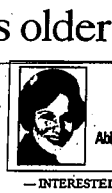
Lady seeks older man for friendship – more?



DEAR ABBY
Abigail VanBuren

DEAR ABBY: I am 34 and divorced for three years. I met a very nice man I'll call Jim at my boss's Christmas party. We hit it off very well (at least I thought we did). He is about 20 years older than I and in the process of getting a divorce. Also, he is a friend of my boss. They play racquetball every week.

At the party, he told me I was "too young." I felt I met a nice person to be friends with, and the age difference doesn't bother me. I have been through a six-year relationship, live on my own and pay my own bills.

It's been two weeks, and I would like to know how I can see him without jeopardizing my job or a friendship. He didn't ask for my phone number, but he knows where I work. Should I sit back and wait, or should I call him? I don't want to embarrass him or myself, but I don't see why a younger woman can't date an older man. I will abide by your advice.

— INTERESTED IN ILLINOIS

DEAR INTERESTED: I advise you to wait. Age is not the only factor. You are an independent woman of the '90s who can ask a man for a date. However, for you to aggressively pursue your boss's still-married friend could be misinterpreted, and you could be hurt, both emotionally and in your career.

DEAR ABBY: Regarding Allen Bouchard's letter on the importance of discarding outdated medications, it is important to realize that while most medications, such as nitroglycerin, lose potency with age, some actually can become toxic.

Tetracycline is an old antibiotic, but it is still commonly used for acne, respiratory infections and the like. Outdated tetracycline can cause permanent kidney damage.

So, please check the dates, discard old medications, and keep all medications out of the reach of children.

— PATRICK A. MAUER, M.D., LOS ANGELES

DEAR DR. MAUER: Thank you for taking time from your busy day to alert my readers that some outdated prescriptions can become toxic. I would warn readers who are discarding old med*ications to carefully dispose of* them so they're out of the reach of children and pets.

DEAR ABBY: Of all the phrases and terms we use, the one that offends me the most is "illegitimate child." I guess I'll go to my grave wondering what a newborn child does to become illegitimate. What horrendous crime did he or she commit? How did he or she sin beyond all redemption to become forever illegitimate?

If there's a stigma to be attached to a child born out of wedlock, let's put it where it belongs – on the parents.

Put the word out, Abby, there is no such thing as an illegitimate child. There are only illegitimate parents.

— GENE IN OLYMPIA, WASH.

DEAR GENE: The term "illegitimate" originates from the old English laws of inheritance. A legitimate child – one born within the bonds of wedlock – could inherit his father's property. An illegitimate child could not.

You are correct that it's not the child's fault that his or her parents didn't marry. Rather, it's the kind of emission and omission on the part of the parents.

ROBERT R. KILDOW, Deceased.

TO: RANDY R. KILDOW

NOTICE IS HEREBY given that a hearing will be held in the Magistrate Division of the above-entitled court at Rupert, Idaho on Monday, the 8th day of March, 1999, at 11 o'clock am on the petition of Rodney N. Kildow for distribution of all of the assets of the estate of Dorotha O. Kildow and all of the assets of the Robert R. Kildow Testamentary Trust to Rodney N. Kildow. The petition requests that none of the assets of said estate or trust be distributed to Randy R. Kildow, for the reason that Randy R. Kildow has failed to render an accounting of his services as personal representative of the estate of Dorotha Kildow or as trustee of the Robert R. Kildow Testamentary Trust, and because petitioner believes that Randy R. Kildow has appropriated to his own use and benefit more than his proportionate share of the assets of the estate of Dorotha Kildow and the Robert R. Kildow Testamentary Trust.

Randy R. Kildow or any other person who intends to contest the petition, he shall file a written notice of appearance and response to the petition with the court at PO Box 474, Rupert, Idaho 83350 and serve a copy of the notice of appearance and response upon Donald J. Chisholm, attorney for the petitioner at PO Box 1118, Burley, Idaho 83318 not later than March 3, 1999.

Copies of the petition in each of the above-entitled matters may be obtained from the Clerk of the Court or from the attorney for the petitioner identified above.

This notice of hearing is issued and published pursuant to an order of the above-entitled court pursuant to § 15-1-401 of the Idaho Code. Randy R. Kildow has failed to provide a mailing address by which service may be accomplished by other means.

Failure of Randy R. Kildow to respond to the petition as provided in this notice will result in entry of an order granting the petition of Rodney N. Kildow.

THE ACES ON BRIDGE®

Bobby Wolff

"To be brave in misfortune is to be worthy of manhood; to be wise in misfortune is to conquer fate."
—Agnes Repplier

Today's slam was played at both tables of a team contest. Both declarers discovered a trump loser early; only one took precautions against a bad diamond break. We can profit from examining both lines of play.

Both West players chose to lead the heart queen instead of the singleton diamond for two reasons: The bidding made it clear that East didn't have the ace, and further, West expected to score a trump trick anyway.

The first declarer took dummy's heart ace and cashed two high trumps to get the bad news. In a hurry to meet his fate, South then cashed two high diamonds, getting more bad news. To make matters worse, South missed an endplay against West and conceded one down.

In the replay, the second declarer also cashed his two high trumps. However, instead of playing diamonds, he cashed his top clubs and dummy's diamond ace. And after cashing dummy's heart king and ruffing dummy's last heart, he gave West his natural trump trick.

Note the difference: In today's layout, West, who had only hearts and clubs left, had to concede a sluff and ruff.

However, South's careful play would have worked against any distribution. With diamonds not both declarers would have made the slam. However, if West had started with the diamond stack (J-10-6-5), he could not lead safely after winning his trump queen. If West exited with the diamond jack, South would play low from dummy to capture it and then take the proven finesse against West's 10.
